The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

MR. SPEAKER'S ABSENCE

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the absence of MR. SPEAKER from this week's sittings.

Whereupon, SIR ALAN HASELHURST, THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS, took the Chair as DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that I express the feeling of the House in regretting the reasons for Mr. Speaker's absence and in relaying the House's great good wishes for his early recovery and return.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Afghanistan

1. Anne Milton (Guildford) (Con): If he will list the aims of the UK deployment to southern Afghanistan. [53933]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): The international community's involvement in Afghanistan is aimed at ensuring that Afghanistan will never again become a breeding ground for international terrorism, by helping the Afghan people to rebuild their democracy, their security and their economy. United Kingdom deployment to southern Afghanistan is part of the UN-mandated, NATO-led international security assistance force, which is expanding across the country in support of this commitment.

Anne Milton: Is the Secretary of State satisfied that there are enough troops in Afghanistan, bearing in mind the lessons from Iraq that ground troops are essential in order to complete missions adequately?

John Reid: Yes, I am satisfied. The hon. Lady will be pleased to know that the Chiefs of Defence Staff fully endorse the force package we are sending. One of the three or four criteria that I laid down before the move south was that the military configuration and size desired by the Chiefs of Staff should be provided, and that was done.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I understand entirely why we have sent troops to the south, but does my right hon. Friend agree that we need a clear exit strategy, with an understanding of how multinational forces will in due course take over from the British so that we do not end up in a quagmire not of our own making, but because there is no clarity about the nature of the exercise?

John Reid: I am sorry that my hon. Friend does not understand it, but there is clarity about exactly what we are doing in Afghanistan and in the south. We are in Afghanistan under a UN mandate with the support of the world community, not through a multinational force but through a NATO-led and NATO-configured force—ISAF—to help the democratically elected Government of Afghanistan extend their democratic authority and build their own security forces, and to assist them in their economic development. That is precisely why we are going to the south. It was envisaged for some time that, after we went in, we would do that in stages. This is stage 3, and it is completely in accord with the planning that we have outlined. I do not hide from my hon. Friend the fact that it is more dangerous and difficult than the first two stages, but I recall, as will everyone in the House, why we are there. We are there to prevent Afghanistan from being used as a training ground, a planning arena and a launch platform for terrorist acts such as those we saw in New York—the worst terrorist act in history.

Mr. Michael Moore (Berwickshire, Roxburgh and Selkirk) (LD): Will the Secretary of State set out how individuals detained by UK forces will be handed over to the Afghan authorities, and the justice procedures that will follow? Are the arrangements common across ISAF forces, and how different are they from those that are reported to apply to US detainees at their base in Bagram?

John Reid: Yes. Anyone detained by British forces is handed to the Afghan authorities within a very short period. That rule applies across Afghanistan wherever British forces are concerned. I think it also applies to the rest of ISAF, but, if the hon. Gentleman will bear with me, I will write to him to clarify the second point that he raises.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): Rather than destroying almost the only livelihood of farmers in the Helmand province of Afghanistan and possibly driving them into the arms of the Taliban, would it not be better to try to license their production to be used not for heroin production but for producing diamorphine? As we know, there is a world shortage of diamorphine, and anyone dying in a third world country has only a 6 per cent. chance of getting diamorphine because 70 per cent. of the world supply is taken by seven rich countries. Would it not be a more stable solution to divert production to diamorphine?

John Reid: No, I am afraid that I do not agree with my hon. Friend. More importantly, neither do our analysts on the ground or, even more importantly, the democratically elected Government of Afghanistan. I understand his suggestion, but we do not believe either that it would be of general benefit to Afghanistan or, indeed, that we could make such a distinction in the conditions that exist there. We therefore throw our whole weight behind the commitment of the Afghan Government, President Karzai and his colleagues in getting rid of that which corrupts the whole of the country's commerce and much of its politics—the production of opium that eventually ends up as the heroin that is pumped as poison into the veins of so many young people in this country.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle) (Con): May I urge the right hon. Gentleman for the third time to halt the dispatch of small contingencies of our forces to south Afghanistan to undertake incompatible tasks that could not be successfully performed even by 100,000 troops or, as Max Hastings has written, by 300,000? Does the right hon. Gentleman remember that in the 1980s the Russians sent 300,000 troops into Afghanistan, but that, several years later, they fled the country, leaving 10,000 dead behind? They were soon followed to their graves by the Soviet Union itself.

John Reid: Yes, and if I remember correctly the then Government in this country and the United States spent a lot of money funding the Mujaheddin in order to fight the Russians. We are now seeing the fruits of some of those decisions, which the hon. Gentleman supported so many years ago.

I listen to what the hon. Gentleman says about Afghanistan and I read to try to catch up with his prolific reading on the subject, but as I pointed out to him previously, there is a difference on two grounds between this intervention and all previous ones. First, we are there at the behest and with the authority of the world community in the United Nations. Secondly, we are there at the invitation of the democratically elected Afghanistan Government. Those two things are not insignificant in comparison with what happened in previous interventions.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): As someone who supported and continues to support the presence of British troops in Afghanistan, certainly following 9/11, and who has no illusions whatsoever about the terrorists who continue to operate, may I ask whether our position would be better if we could persuade the United States that detainees should be charged and not held in Guantanamo Bay and that Guantanamo Bay is a disgrace to democracy and should be closed as quickly as possible? Let us urge that, as a partner and ally of the United States.

John Reid rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the Secretary of State will recognise that the question is about deployment in Afghanistan.

John Reid: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker. People will have different views on Guantanamo Bay, but I think that the whole House will recognise that it was a response to the biggest ever terrorist attack in history, launched from Afghanistan, which is precisely why we are trying to prevent any such terrorist attacks in the future. Like my hon. Friend, I regret not only the need for Guantanamo Bay, as seen from the American point of view but, more importantly, the growth of international terrorism, which has confronted so many of us with the problems that we are now facing in terms of our own freedoms in this country. One of the great debates that we have had, of course, is to what extent we must curtail those freedoms to stop international terrorists using those very freedoms to destroy those very freedoms. Whatever differences and views we have on aspects of this matter, let us recognise where the cause of all these problems lies—with the international terrorists themselves.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): First, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I fully associate the Conservative party with your good wishes to Mr. Speaker? I am delighted that he chose to be treated in the unit in which I trained in Glasgow royal infirmary; I am pleased that it is still the unit of choice for VIPs.

In Afghanistan, there is no question about the abilities of our troops or their commanders. There is some concern about a potential strategic mismatch. Our troops will be involved in the anti-narcotics operation in protection, lift, intelligence and everything except crop destruction itself. Unless a full programme is in place to compensate Afghan farmers, we might find that the war against opium makes the war against terror more difficult by creating a resurgent Taliban. Exactly what steps will be taken to provide alternative income to Afghan farmers and in what time scale, so that the risks to our troops are minimised?

John Reid: At the beginning of Defence questions, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I refrained from repeating your best wishes to the Speaker, but I follow the hon. Gentleman in doing so. I take a great deal of pride and satisfaction in the Speaker's choosing to use a vital part of our national health service in order to effect his recovery, about which I know all hon. Members will be pleased.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that if the narcotics trade is undermined as part of economic development, it is important that we accompany our attacks on the middlemen—the mafia—with making sure that the farmers who produce such crops have alternative livelihoods, which is a point that bore heavily on our consideration before we went in. The Department for International Development will put some £20 million into Helmand, and the American moneys allocated to that area, which amount to some $100 million, will continue for at least 18 months. Every effort will be made to ensure that any intervention to cut off income is supplemented by alternative income in the first instance and, eventually, by alternative livelihoods; otherwise, as the hon. Gentleman has rightly pointed out, we will create not stability, but further insurgency.

Military Technology

2. Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): What recent discussions his Department has had with the United States about the transfer of military technology. [53934]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): We have regular discussions at ministerial and official level with the US Government concerning the issue of technology transfer.

Mr. Ellwood: We have stood shoulder to shoulder with the Americans not only on the battlefield, but in the corridors of diplomacy and on the factory floor. Joint efforts to build a replacement for the Sea Harrier are being challenged by a corner of Capitol Hill. Will the Minister and the Secretary of State do what they can to ensure that the necessary technology is shared? Otherwise, we will have two new aircraft carriers, but no aircraft to put on them.

Mr. Ingram: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's conclusion, but I share the view that everyone who meets senior US legislators in Washington and elsewhere should point out that we are their longest and best ally. The Secretary of State has raised the matter directly with the US Secretary of State for Defence in the past two weeks, and that process continues daily through every contact that we can make. I am sure that the Conservative Members who recently visited Washington spread that message, too.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): In his comments on the joint strike fighter in The Times today, Lord Drayson states that he has made technology transfer a priority:

"The Government could demand a final assembly and check-out line" for the building of the joint strike fighter. Is that the case, and will the Government demand such an outcome in order to protect jobs in the north-west?

Mr. Ingram: I wonder whether Lord Drayson's remarks were reported accurately. The matter is vital and detailed discussions are taking place with the US Administration. The strength of our view has been made known and has been articulated time and again from the Dispatch Box and on both sides of the House. We will continue to ensure that we get best value from the project.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): It is true that we agree across the Dispatch Box that a failure by the United States to permit the transfer of technology to enable us to service our own aircraft would amount to an unacceptable loss of British sovereignty. However, do not US suspicions about its technology leaching out to France and elsewhere inevitably increase when Javier Solana states that he wants the European Defence Agency to be responsible for at least 20 per cent. of all European military research spending? Ministers cannot have it both ways—protesting in Washington and then sneaking off to Brussels to sign up to technology sharing with our European partners is hardly likely to win friends in Congress.

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman sets a hare running that has no substance whatsoever. His allegation has no foundation. The fact that some senior representative in Europe expresses his point of view does not necessarily mean that it is our point of view.

Landing Ships Dock (Auxiliary) Project

3. Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): What recent progress there has been on the landing ships dock (auxiliary) project; and if he will make a statement. [53935]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The landing ships dock (auxiliary) project continues to make progress towards the completion of the four bay class vessels. RFA Mounts Bay, the first ship built by BAE Systems in Glasgow and accepted off contract in December 2005, is undergoing her capability trials in readiness for meeting her in-service date in late 2006. RFA Largs Bay, the first Swan Hunter-built ship, is undergoing final preparations for contractor sea trials, which are scheduled to start next month. Build and testing continues on the remaining two ships.

Philip Davies: I thank the Minister for that reply, but he conveniently glossed over the fact that the cost of the contract with Swan Hunter is now double the original

MOD estimate. I have a freedom of information request that indicates that, as at October 2005, the MOD had already made payments of £295 million to Swan Hunter out of a total revised contract of £309 million. The first ship is yet to be completed. If it has cost us that much to come this far, how much more will it cost to get these ships into service?

Mr. Ingram: I did not gloss over that point, as the question that the hon. Gentleman tabled did not ask me to comment on it. I responded on the progress that has been made on procuring and delivering the ships, which is the most important aspect of all this. I do not deny that there have been cost over-runs. That is to be regretted, and it has implications for the rest of our procurement programme. The important point is that these ships are vital. The negotiations that have taken place not only with Swan Hunter but with BAE Systems on the completion of the contract must remain in confidence. The full contract price will no doubt surface eventually. Many Conservative Members are campaigning to close Swan Hunter—perhaps they should go up to the north-east and say why.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the work that the Clyde work force, in particular, has done on Cardigan Bay and Mounts Bay has been exemplary and that they should be congratulated on it? Are not the problems that we have with morale in the British shipbuilding industry caused by those who try to put it down at every possible opportunity instead of trying to build it up to ensure that we remain the force that we are seen to be throughout the world?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend is absolutely right, and he speaks for this country's shipbuilding areas. This is the largest warship building programme that we have had for very many years. The future of shipbuilding is exceptionally bright, and at the end of the process we will have an exceptional and modern Navy. We should congratulate not only those who are involved in procuring that process but, as my hon. Friend says, those who are building the ships, of which we will be proud for many decades to come.

Iran

4. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): What assessment he has made of Iran's nuclear weapons capability and delivery systems; and if he will make a statement. [53936]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): We continue to assess closely the development of a potential nuclear weapons capability in Iran, including delivery systems, taking careful note of the reports of the International Atomic Energy Agency. Iran has failed so far to provide the international community with the necessary confidence that its nuclear programme is for exclusively peaceful purposes, and we remain concerned that it is developing options for a nuclear weapons capability. We await the forthcoming detailed report from the IAEA.

Mr. Amess: Given that the Iranian President has already threatened to wipe one country from the face of the earth, does the Secretary of State agree that an Iranian regime armed with nuclear weapons should be avoided at all costs?

John Reid: International concern, to which the history of deception about the development of nuclear capacity, as testified to by the International Atomic Energy Agency, gives rise is only heightened by statements such as those that the hon. Gentleman mentioned. The international community is united in ensuring that Iran does not develop nuclear capacity. That would be destabilising for the whole world, not only one area of it.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Is my right hon. Friend satisfied with the strength of the international resolve to prevent Iran from becoming a nuclear weapons state? What does he believe the next step should be?

John Reid: One of the effects of the diplomacy pursued by what has become known as the E3—the United Kingdom, under the Foreign Secretary, Germany and France—has been to build increasing unanimity and solidarity in the international community, increasing awareness of the dangers and increasing regret that Iran has, thus far, not taken the opportunity to try to resolve the matter diplomatically. The next step must surely be for Iran to re-engage in suspending the activities that breached its earlier promises and to try to do that before 6 March, when the next meeting of the International Atomic Energy Agency takes place. Like the whole international community, I hope that Iran will take the opportunity to re-engage and try to find a diplomatic resolution of the problem.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex) (Con): In assessing Iran's nuclear capabilities and seeking, as the free world is, a peaceful solution to the serious problem, does the Secretary of State agree that China, Russia and India are probably best placed to take the lead in seeking a peaceful resolution? Will he discuss with our American friends how we may best engage the efforts of those three countries?

John Reid: The problem is one for the whole international community—that is increasingly recognised. Doubtless particular countries are well placed to encourage, persuade and allow the Iranians to reach such a diplomatic solution. One is obviously Russia. It is therefore regrettable that, at this stage, the Iranians appear to have rejected the overtures that the Russians have made and the avenues that they have opened. The suspicion grows that their position on the Russian efforts merely constitutes delaying tactics. I hope that that is not the case. I am convinced that there is an increasing resolve in the world, including the countries that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, to ensure that there is no question of Iran developing the capacity for nuclear weaponry.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that there are increasing obligations for technology transfer for peaceful purposes. What protections are in place for the development of wider, peaceful use of nuclear power and avoiding the transfer of some of that technology to countries such as Iran, as occurred under A. Q. Khan's regime?

John Reid: The non-proliferation treaty is the most important element of international agreement that aims at what my hon. Friend outlines. It is worrying for the whole international community that Iran appears to have breached its safeguard obligations under the NPT for some time. I can do no better than quote Dr. el-Baradei, who made it clear in an interview with Newsweek as recently as 23 January that "even after three years I am not yet in a position to make a judgement on the peaceful nature of the nuclear program" in Iran.

It must be recognised that neither the EU nor the international community as a whole is trying to deny Iran access to nuclear technology. Indeed, the European proposals of 5 August outlined our readiness to consider a number of significant elements in support of a civilian nuclear programme. However, the IAEA has made it clear to Iran that it lacks confidence in the peaceful aims of its nuclear programme; that is the essential element of the problem. We have therefore asked Iran to suspend all enrichment and reprocessing activity, as a confidence-building measure. I am afraid that its refusal to maintain that suspension only heightens the suspicions and concerns of the international community, and the sooner it gets back into dialogue to resolve this matter diplomatically, the better it will be for the whole world.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): As one of the more sensible and consistent members of the Cabinet, will the Secretary of State tell us whether he agrees with the Foreign Secretary, who says that he can conceive of no circumstances in which military action to prevent Iran from getting nuclear weapons would be contemplated, or with the Prime Minister, who says that he has ruled out no form of action whatever?

John Reid: I am not aware of anyone who is considering or speaking about military action, certainly not at this stage. I do not think that that is on anyone's agenda. There is therefore an obligation on all of us to try to find a diplomatic solution to the problem. That is precisely why we have made so many efforts in that direction, and why I hope that, even at this late stage before the IAEA's meeting on 6 March, Iran will re-engage constructively with the international community, possibly under the auspices of Russia or through some other mechanism. We all want to see a diplomatic resolution to this matter.

Joint Combat Aircraft

5. Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): If he will make a statement on the development of the joint combat aircraft. [53937]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): Substantial progress has been made in the system development and demonstration phase of the joint strike fighter programme, with the recent completion of the critical design review for the short take-off and vertical landing variant. Progress in building development aircraft is also on schedule, with assembly of the first development aircraft largely complete, and first flight expected towards the end of this year. In conjunction with the United States and the other international partners in the joint strike fighter programme, we are negotiating the terms of the memorandum of understanding for the co-operative production, support and follow-on development phase. We expect to conclude these negotiations by the end of this year.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Minister for his reply, but the last of our few remaining Sea Harriers are now being withdrawn, no doubt to be flogged off abroad at a knockdown price. Given that we shall shortly have no maritime fighter aircraft to protect the fleet, what is the Government's plan B if, for any reason, the joint combat aircraft programme does not proceed?

Mr. Ingram: Indeed, I think that the Sea Harriers are being decommissioned today, and we should mark that event because they have provided great service. We have explored the reasons for this decision time and again in the House and I do not want to repeat them. We have also discussed our plan B. As ever, the Ministry of Defence has plans A to Z to deal with every eventuality—

Mr. Francois: Tell us what they are.

Mr. Ingram: Well, what we shall not do, when we are in the middle of negotiating the best option, is inform the hon. Gentleman what all the other options are, because I am sure that others would put that information to good use.

European Defence Agency

7. Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future of the European Defence Agency. [53939]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): The United Kingdom will play a leading role in the European Defence Agency to ensure that it continues to identify opportunities for co-operation, which will improve European member states' defence capabilities. In our view, the European Defence Agency is about co-operating with partners to leverage the maximum benefit from the money spent. It is not about creating a central budget to fund an EU defence force.

Mr. Atkinson: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer. Will he reassure the House, however, that when he meets his fellow European Ministers in a few days to fix the agency's budget, he will not accept the French Government's suggestion that there should be a common European defence budget?

John Reid: I can reassure the hon. Gentleman and the House on that point. My view of the matter is simple. First, the European Defence Agency should be an institution that brings member states together to collaborate on projects, not one that substitutes for national discernment and creates a further bureaucratic, central procurement agency. Secondly, it should walk before it tries to run, and any increase in budget should be commensurate with that approach. Therefore, the institution should be more in the form of a dating agency than one that will supplant all the other procurement agencies.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): On the subject of dating, when my right hon. Friend met his French opposite number recently—I think that it was at the Ritz or the Savoy hotel—did they discuss the proposal to spend more on research through the European Defence Agency? Bearing in mind the fact that Britain and France contribute two thirds of the entire EU research budget, surely this programme will mean that EU partners will collaborate and the results will be available to all EU partners, which is very much in the spirit of the St. Malo agreement.

John Reid: On the subject that my hon. Friend raises, I did not discuss that matter with my friend the French Defence Minister when I met her in Admiralty house, which, as he knows, is where Nelson planned the battle of Trafalgar, in Churchill's Cabinet rooms, which we visited together, or, as he correctly points out, when we had tea at the Ritz. I did, however, discuss the matter at the penultimate meeting of the European Defence Agency, where we considered the preliminary advance in the budget from €4 million. I felt that we should move to €5 million and the French felt that we should move to €70 million. We compromised on €6 million, which is the sort of compromise that I rather like.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring) (Con): The Government's document presented to the House in January, "Prospects for the European Union in 2006", states:

"On military capabilities, the EU will start work on developing the Force Catalogue of Member States' military assets".

It also states:

"The European Defence Agency will expand its activities this year".

How far does the Secretary of State expect those activities to expand? What would be the full cost of that? Are we not seeing technology and procurement being used as a backdoor route to European defence integration?

John Reid: I think that I answered the hon. Gentleman's question just before he asked it. So far, we have agreed an increase in the budget from around €4 million to around €6 million, as opposed to the €70 million which some partners were looking for. We very much view the European Defence Agency—which is under the stewardship of chief executive Nick Witney, who is a former Ministry of Defence official—as an agency that brings together willing partners in collaboration. We do not envisage it as some central, major, new European procurement agency. In areas such as research and development and technology, however, we, the French and other major partners could get better value for money from collaboration. Those are precisely the areas in which we can work together constructively.

Afghanistan

8. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): If he will make a statement on British troop levels in Afghanistan. [53940]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): UK troop numbers in Afghanistan are currently around 1,600. They will increase in coming months, peaking at around 5,700, and reducing to around 4,700 by the autumn. They will be reduced further next year when NATO headquarters in Kabul is no longer under United Kingdom stewardship.

Mr. Gray: In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Anne Milton) a moment ago, the Secretary of State described the tasks faced by our troops as establishing democracy, ending terrorism, achieving security in the south of Afghanistan, helping the economy of Afghanistan and dealing with poppy destruction. Will he now tell us how he will judge when each of those tasks has been completed, how long that will take, and what our exit strategy is?

John Reid: We will make our judgment on the basis of changes on the ground: extension of central Government control, a reduction in insurgency, growth of the Afghan security forces and economic development. The exit strategy involves one of the entrance aims: the achievement of a degree of success in all those respects in a relatively short time—three years—in the south. As I have said many times, we do not expect the area to become Hampshire, or New Hampshire, but it will be in a significantly better state than it is now. On the security side, for instance, we expect training and capability to have been achieved for between 7,500 and 8,000 more Afghan security forces in the south in three years' time. That is roughly the number of soldiers who have been sent in by the International Security Assistance Force, and it forms the basis of a replacement of our presence by Afghan security forces and our withdrawal.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): May I hark back to the discussion on Question 1? I am sure my right hon. Friend will agree that if farmers are to be persuaded to give up producing a non-perishable product at a relatively high price and grow perishable goods which they can convey to a sizeable market, Afghanistan must have a good infrastructure. In particular, it must have good roads and bridges. Will the increased number of armed troops help the Afghans to build a better infrastructure?

John Reid: It is important for the House to understand why we are there and what our role is. We are there to prevent Afghanistan from slipping back to the status of a failed state, which would enable it to be used by terrorists as a Trojan horse. Our troops are not there to seek out and destroy the terrorists; that is being done, under Operation Enduring Freedom, by an American-led multinational coalition. We are there to ensure that, in the medium and longer term, there is a build-up not just of central Government and their own security forces but of economic development.

Our forces are in southern Afghanistan—along with the Dutch, the Danes, the Estonians, the Canadians and others—to provide a security umbrella under which the Afghans themselves, aided by other civilian authorities, can build not only a degree of infrastructure but the beginnings of economic development. I take my hon. Friend's point entirely.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): The Secretary of State has told us about the number of troops who are going to the Helmand province in southern Afghanistan, but the Americans found that reconstruction was difficult to achieve because the troops were so thinly spread. Can the Secretary of State confirm first, that non-governmental organisations are poised and ready to act, and secondly, that we will have enough troops to protect them so that that crucial work can be done?

John Reid: I can confirm both those points. If the hon. Gentleman wants an illustration, I can tell him that about 20 times as many British troops are going to Helmand as there are American troops there now. The number of American troops who are there, and in Urozgan to the north where the Dutch are going, is relatively small. It is precisely because we are there to act as a cover for many other social and civilian activities that we need more troops. Those 3,300 troops—together with about 800 engineers, who will return once the camps are built—are a significant force, and of the configuration for which the chiefs of staff asked. It is perfectly valid for hon. Members on both sides of the House to ask legitimate questions about the force configuration, rules of engagement and so on. It is perfectly legitimate, too, to point out the dangers, but we all ought to be careful not to cross the threshold into despondency and defeatism before we even arrive, because that does no one any good, particularly our very brave troops.

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South) (LD): Will the Secretary of State confirm that the British commander, who is also the NATO commander, will have at his disposal all the assets of NATO countries deployed in Afghanistan? When it comes to the deployment of American assets, will he have to go through the separate American command structure if those assets are to be made available to him?

John Reid: I confirm that the NATO commander to whom the hon. Gentleman referred is a British general, and is content with the arrangements both for the deployment to the south and to assist him in meeting the needs of the wider Afghan stage. Like everyone else, including hon. Members, he would no doubt like even more forces at his disposal, but he is content with the configuration that has been provided. I am not sure that I understood the hon. Gentleman's question about American forces operating under Operation Enduring Freedom.

Mr. Hancock: No. NATO.

John Reid: NATO forces—yes. As far as I am aware, the NATO commander who is taking over in theatre from May is content with the configuration. If I find for any reason that I need to qualify my statement about the American forces at the commander's disposal, I shall write to the hon. Gentleman, because I would not wish to mislead him.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): The Secretary of State should understand that the reason why the Opposition are questioning him and have made those points is that we very much want our deployment in Afghanistan to be successful. We want our troops to succeed, which is why we are questioning the Secretary of State about these matters. Following his answer to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), is he satisfied that the spending by our US allies and the Department for International Development on alternative livelihoods for Afghan poppy farmers is adequate given the scale of the illegal drugs trade? If not, we risk uniting the remnants of the Taliban, the warlords of the south and local populations in a lethal combination against our soldiers.

John Reid: On the first point, it is precisely because I recognised the legitimacy of his question that I accorded such status to the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray). I was simply warning that robust but illegitimate questioning can aid people who would wish us not to succeed in Afghanistan. However, I accept the sincerity with which questions have been asked—of course I do.

Secondly, I am satisfied that the allocation of resources both by the Department for International Development and by our American allies is significant, and will allow us to ensure the provision of interim incomes and eventually the development of alternative livelihoods for farmers to minimise the chances of their being forced into insurgency. Of course, I would always like more money—that is the case for almost every project—but we have a satisfactory amount. Indeed, that was the second criterion that I laid down when I said that we needed the configuration that our chiefs wanted, supplementary income to provide alternative livelihoods, and the required NATO configuration before we went in. I am satisfied that we have met that criterion.

Education

9. Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the defence industry on encouraging the take-up of defence-related courses in educational establishments. [53941]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Don Touhig): The Government recognise the need for a stronger supply of skilled research and technology staff, and the defence sector is no exception. The Ministry of Defence actively promotes the education of science, engineering and technology in our schools and colleges through dedicated presentations and visits to schools by technical experts.

Dr. Kumar: I thank the Minister for that reply. Does he agree that if we are to maintain a strong defence industry, we need to encourage more young people to study engineering? Will he use his good offices to build strong links between the defence industry and engineering colleges, and will he congratulate Freeborough community college in my constituency, which has just been designated as an engineering college?

Mr. Touhig: I know that my hon. Friend has a distinguished background as a chemical engineer. I agree that we need to value our engineers and encourage young people to go into engineering. Defence and engineering go hand in hand, and there are many examples of how strong links between engineering, training and defence have brought great benefits to colleges and students alike. I certainly congratulate Freeborough community college on having attained the status of an engineering college.

Nuclear Deterrent

11. Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): What plans he has to replace the British nuclear deterrent. [53943]

The Secretary of State for Defence (John Reid): The Government are committed to retaining our minimum nuclear deterrent, as currently represented by Trident, for the foreseeable future. No decisions have yet been taken on any replacement for our current system.

Nick Herbert: I thank the Secretary of State for that reply, but as our sole nuclear deterrent, Trident, will no longer be viable in 15 to 20 years' time, are we not reaching the point where decisions can no longer be avoided about replacing it? Is not the danger of nuclear proliferation in the middle east reason enough to begin a debate now on the need to update our nuclear deterrent as the ultimate guarantor of our national security?

John Reid: As the hon. Gentleman correctly said, we are talking about decisions that may have to be taken in 15 to 20 years' time. I do not think that the whole situation has become that much more urgent since the last time I was asked that question last month. Let me make the position absolutely clear: for the foreseeable future, we are retaining our minimum nuclear deterrent. At some stage, preferably in the course of this Parliament, we will have to take a decision about how we wish to continue after that—that is, in 15 to 20 years' time. When I have received papers or advice on this matter, I will begin to share the discussion with the House. I have no doubt that, at the next Question Time, the hon. Gentleman will return to the subject, as he is entitled to do, but at this stage I have nothing more to say because we have not yet embarked on the process of making the decision in principle or in detail.

Naval Procurement

12. Mr. Denis MacShane (Rotherham) (Lab): If he will make a statement on his policy on procurement of royal naval vessels. [53945]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The purpose of the defence industrial strategy is to ensure that the capability requirements of the armed forces can be met now and in the future. As such, it recognises the importance of sustaining the high-end, value-added, systems engineering skills to manage the integration of complex ships and their combat systems, which are critical for national security and sovereignty.

Mr. MacShane: I welcome the Minister's statement. His heart is in the right place, but steelworkers in my constituency are concerned at reports that some in Whitehall want substantially to offshore the building of Her Majesty's ships. Can I be assured that the steel of our new generation of royal naval ships will be built in Britain, that we will avoid the procurement boom and bust policies of the Conservative party, and that we will have a sustained programme of building royal naval vessels which keeps the bulk of the work in the United Kingdom? If the vessels are to sail under Her Majesty's flag, they should be built on Her Majesty's territory.

Mr. Ingram: As my right hon. Friend knows—he is very knowledgeable about all this—the defence industrial strategy is the first serious attempt to ensure that our approach smoothes out the peaks and troughs of what is unquestionably a major shipbuilding programme. When we get to 2016, that high, sustained effort will go into decline. We are seeking to ensure not only that we have continuity in shipbuilding capacity and, hopefully, alongside that, in steelmaking capacity, but that we retain the high-grade skills that are required to put sophisticated systems in place. All those things will have to be judged on the basis of what is best for defence and how industry can best meet those needs. Industry, the work force and the Ministry of Defence strongly support that new strategy. We will have to see how it develops as the years roll by.

Peace-building (Africa)

13. Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to strengthen African peacebuilding capabilities. [53947]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The Ministry of Defence contributes to the strengthening of African peacebuilding capabilities by training and advising personnel from the African Union and various African armed forces in peace-support operations. That is achieved bilaterally through permanently deployed and short-term training teams in key countries, and also by direct UK support to international training centres. In addition to our network of defence attaches, some 120 British armed forces personnel are based in sub-Saharan Africa to assist in those tasks.

Helen Goodman: I am grateful to the Minister for that response. Given that sub-Saharan Africa is the most heavily mined region in the world, will he tell the House what work is taking place to train African forces in mine clearance?

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend is right to highlight that problem, which has led to the loss of hundreds—if not thousands—of lives in recent years. We have major training facilities in a number of countries. Indeed, I recently visited and opened a de-mining training centre in Kenya, where people from elsewhere in the African Union—and beyond—are trained in that very important technique. Another major development is the training of sniffer dogs in the detection of explosive devices—an area in which we have expertise. All those efforts will unquestionably save lives in sub-Saharan Africa, and perhaps beyond.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): Does the Minister agree that our efforts to keep peace in Africa have been severely hampered by the fact that the Ministry of Defence has had to write off £400 million in the past two financial years, after a series of blunders by its procurement department? [Interruption.]

Mr. Ingram: Someone said from a sedentary position that that was a friendly question; I sometimes wonder where the Conservatives are coming from on this issue. Our defence strategy has led to a massive increase in support in those areas, and there has been a massive increase in international development aid, so we should be credited for all that we are doing. We are taking a leading role among the G8 countries, within the European Union and within the United Nations in developing such initiatives, so a bit of credit where credit is due would not go amiss.

UN Operations (Africa)

17. Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): What UK armed forces are deployed with UN operations in Africa. [53951]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The UK currently supports four UN operations in Africa. Those deployments include two officers in Sudan, six in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, three in Liberia and one in Sierra Leone. Our personnel all occupy key positions in the UN headquarters staff who are leading each mission; they are making a vital contribution and giving us unquestioned influence.

Mr. Cunningham: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. What contribution are EU countries making to peacekeeping in Africa in terms not only of armed forces, but of resources and aid?

Mr. Ingram: I did not quite catch whether my hon. Friend said "AU" or "EU".

Mr. Cunningham: EU.

Mr. Ingram: My hon. Friend comes from a different part of Lanarkshire from me and sometimes the accent changes. The EU is of course very significantly involved, not least in Darfur but in other areas as well. In countries where there are particular issues that have to be dealt with, we are seeking to deal with them. A key example is the Democratic Republic of the Congo, where the EU's mission is concerned with supporting security sector reform. The AU is also extensively involved and, as has been said time and again, we need African solutions to Africa's problems. Both we and the EU are trying to build the AU's capacity in that regard.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): A critical part of peacekeeping in Africa is reducing the number of small arms entering the country, many of which come from Yemen into the horn of Africa. Is any work being done under UN auspices, or bilaterally with the Government of Yemen, to ensure effective interdiction of the small arms trade into the horn of Africa?

Mr. Ingram: Well, effective interdiction is a big phrase. We can set out to achieve that ambition, but there are many porous borders. Whether the arms come from the maritime sector or across land, it is difficult to achieve that objective. Both the EU and the UN recognise that it is a serious problem and significant efforts are being made to combat it. One or two key issues are being addressed to see how we can stop that trade and the movement of those dangerous weapons. Success will be difficult to achieve, by the very nature of the circumstances, but not from lack of effort.

Points of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On 7 February, the Procedure Committee heard evidence from the Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office in relation to the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill. During that evidence, the Minister said that he would publish a response to the report by the Regulatory Reform Committee before the Standing Committee met to consider the Bill. The Committee is due to start consideration of the Bill tomorrow at 10.30 am, but the Minister has not yet responded to the recommendations of the Select Committee. I have spoken to the Clerk of the Regulatory Reform Committee, who tells me that far from receiving a detailed response from the Government, he has received only a letter, as yet unpublished, which will be put before members of the Standing Committee when it meets tomorrow.

I hope you share my view that that is intolerable. The Government said that they would publish their response before the Standing Committee met. They have not done so and the members of the Committee have not therefore had the chance to table amendments in response to the Government's comments. At a time when the Government talk about bringing Parliament closer to the people, this is evidence that they are doing the opposite by denying the people's representatives the chance to challenge the Government.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As one of those who will serve on Standing Committee A tomorrow and who has already tabled amendments, I think it is wrong that a Minister should give the impression—as the Under-Secretary did—that we would be able to table amendments knowing the Government's response to the views of a senior Committee. In fact, we have had to table amendments without the benefit of that advice. Should not the Minister come before the House and explain himself, so that we may prepare properly for tomorrow morning?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I say to the hon. Gentlemen that it is unsatisfactory if the work of the Committee will be impeded by lack of information. I am sure that the airing of that complaint now means that it will have been heard, and that there will be other ways to pursue the Minister in question, so that matters may proceed satisfactorily tomorrow.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it still the convention that Members of Parliament write to other hon. Members in advance if they visit their constituencies? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes."] Last Tuesday, three members of the parliamentary Liberal party, which is 5 per cent. of the total, came to Leicester, East, where they dined with the former Member for Leicester, South at a public meeting, where they consumed chicken tikka massala and Cobra beer. Their satellite navigation system might not have been working or they may have misunderstood the term "constituency week". I take it to mean spending more time in one's own constituency: they obviously feel that it means spending more time in other people's constituencies. I do not mind them coming to Leicester, which is a fabulous city, and I would have been happy to meet them there, but I wondered if that convention was still in existence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, the hon. Gentleman might have spared us some of the detail. However, it is customary that when hon. Members visit another's constituency for political reasons, they notify that Member in advance. The whole House would work on a better basis if that practice were observed. However, if they visit just to eat chicken tikka massala, notification is not necessary.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the circumstances, I feel that I need to make a confession. I regularly visit the constituency of the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) and I have to tell him that I neglected to write to him on almost all those occasions, but he will of course be reassured because my mother, who is one of his constituents, happens to live in Leicester, East. I can give him my absolute assurance that I have never schemed his downfall in my mother's house.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Before you sum up, I would like you to bear in mind the fact that if the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) is correct and has been visiting some constituency, speaking on behalf of some Liberal Democrat candidate, the chances are, based on his record of the past few months, that the candidate will not do very well.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the House will have benefited from that timely warning. Perhaps I could say to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) that everyone will get an invitation from his mother in due course, so we shall all be on an equal footing in future.

Government of Wales Bill (Programme) (No. 2)

3.36 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I beg to move,

That the Order of 9th January 2006 (Government of Wales Bill (Programme)) be varied as follows:

1. Paragraphs 6 to 8 shall be omitted.

2. Proceedings on consideration and Third Reading shall be completed in two days.

3. Proceedings on consideration shall be taken on each of those days as shown in the first column of the Table and in the order so shown.

4. Each part of those proceedings shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the time specified in relation to it in the second column of the Table.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on the second day.

First Day

| Proceedings | Time for conclusion of proceedings |
|---|---|
| Amendments relating to Clauses 1 and 2, Schedule 1 and Clauses 3 to 22. | Two hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion for this Order. |
| Amendments relating to Clauses 23 to 27, Schedule 2 and Clauses 28 to 44. | The moment of interruption. |

Second Day

| Proceedings | Time for conclusion of proceedings |
| Amendments relating to Clauses 45 to 58, Schedule 3, Clauses 59 to 87, Schedule 4, Clauses 88 to 93, Schedule 5, Clauses 94 to 102, Schedule 6, Clauses 103 to 107, Schedule 7, Clauses 108 to 144, Schedule 8, Clauses 145 to 148, Schedule 9, Clauses 149 to 159, Schedule 10, Clauses 160 and 161, Schedule 11, Clause 162, Schedule 12 and Clauses 163 to 165; new Clauses and new Schedules; any other proceedings on the Bill. | One and a half hours before the moment of interruption. |

The programme motion seeks to ensure adequate debate on parts of the Bill that have attracted amendments to be considered on Report. It follows three days in Committee on the Floor of the House, during which the Bill received thorough and detailed scrutiny, particularly of the parts that are genuinely new enhanced primary powers and of proposals for reforming the electoral system.

The House will be aware that 93 of the 165 clauses are based closely on sections of the Government of Wales Act 1998. A further 48 clauses relate to the separation of the legislature from the Executive, a policy that has all-party support. Only 24 clauses are concerned with the new provisions relating to the Assembly's enhanced—and, subject to a referendum, primary—legislative powers. It was thus right and proper for the House to focus on scrutinising parts of the Bill that are novel and which it has not previously considered, while devoting less time to aspects that have cross-party support, such as the separation of the Executive and the legislature.

Despite the points that I have just made, the House will recall that at the end of the Committee, the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) objected on a point of order that the House had been unable to scrutinise 133 clauses. Consequently, she asked for more time for consideration in Committee. The House will want to note that at no time was such a request made through the usual channels. Indeed, an intervention from the shadow Leader of the House, the right hon. Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), on 26 January was the only suggestion of any kind from the official Opposition that more time might be needed. That point was raised through the usual channels immediately afterwards, yet even then the Opposition did not press a request for more time.

The programme motion for the Committee was agreed with cross-party support. Furthermore, consideration of the Bill was organised to ensure that the House concentrated its scrutiny on provisions that were genuinely new, or controversial. The House will recall that the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham expressed particular concern that there was no opportunity for the House to scrutinise the "extremely complex financial provisions" of the Bill, so I was extremely surprised to see that not a single Conservative amendment has been tabled on those provisions on Report. I should be interested to hear the hon. Lady's explanation of that apparent oversight.

The programme motion seeks to guarantee that the amendments on outstanding issues of contention receive appropriate scrutiny. If accepted, the programme motion will ensure that amendments relating to parts 1 and 2, which deal with the legal separation between the National Assembly for Wales and the Welsh Assembly Government, will be considered on the first day of consideration on Report. Although some of the provisions that relate to the Assembly's electoral arrangements have been debated in Committee, some of the remaining provisions in parts 1 and 2 have not yet been scrutinised by the House and have attracted amendments. We have therefore sought to ensure that those amendments that have been selected receive adequate time.

Day 2 will allow the consideration of the provisions in parts 3 to 6. The provisions in parts 3 and 4 that relate to Assembly measures and Acts of the Assembly received detailed consideration in Committee. The programme motion will ensure that amendments relating to those parts that have been selected for consideration and those relating to the remaining parts of the Bill will receive an appropriate amount of time for debate.

In conclusion, the programme motion will ensure that the debates on Report and Third Reading will address all parts of the Bill where amendments have been tabled and selected. I commend the programme motion to the House.

3.40 pm

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I will not take up the House's time at great length for the simple reason that the way in which the programme motion has been drafted means that every minute we spend discussing it takes time from the debate on the first two groups of amendments, where the Government have so thoughtfully inserted a guillotine after two hours. I presume, of course, that the insertion of that guillotine has nothing to do with any meeting that may take place outwith the Chamber, but we must ask ourselves why a programme motion is on the Order Paper today, when there have been no such guillotines throughout the consideration of the Bill.

The junior Minister is right: I did object to the fact that 133 clauses have not been discussed. Therefore, on past record, it hardly seems worth while even to table amendments to the financial provisions, because we can be assured that there will be no opportunity to discuss them in the limited time available on Report and Third Reading.

I do not want to rerun old battles, but it was correct that we asked for more time on the Floor of the House at business questions. I had believed that matters brought to the attention of the Leader of the House on the Floor of the House would be taken seriously. He did not even bother to respond; nor did he write to my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) afterwards to explain why no time could be given to the Bill. In fact, I think that it was suggested at one stage that we could debate more of Bill in Committee upstairs to enable us to discuss it fully. After all, is not this the Bill that the Secretary of State for Wales has described as settling the business of devolution for a generation? Therefore, is it right that such a large part of it should remain undebated in the Chamber?

The junior Minister's assertion that 93 clauses are based loosely on the original Bill is correct, but that does not mean that they should not be revisited; otherwise why would the Secretary of State be placing the whole Bill once again before the House for scrutiny? I hope that that was not a vain attempt to slip the Bill past the House, with any laxity as far as hon. Members' ability to scrutinise the Bill is concerned.

The time given to the debate on Third Reading is derisory: one and a half hours on a main constitutional Bill. I can only presume that the Labour party once more assumes that very few Labour Members from Wales will participate in the debate and that not too many contributions are expected to the Third Reading debate. The Bill has been notable for the fact that very few Labour Members who sit for Welsh seats have taken an enormously active part in it, which is a great shame.

Without further ado and not wanting to take any more of the House's time, I am afraid to say that I have major objections to the programme motion, and I will ask my colleagues to vote against it.

3.43 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I am slightly surprised by the Conservative position on the programme motion. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) says that she tried to ring me, but I was in Leicester, talking to my mum. Apparently, my three leadership candidates are also visiting my mother. I will have words to say about that later. Nevertheless, the concern is that she needed to speak not just with me but with the House before we voted on the programme motion initially.

I do not want to make a very big thing of this, but I personally feel that if I support a programme motion, I am obliged to try to make it work. I certainly do not feel that I am in a position to come back and condemn the Government for a decision with which I originally concurred. The inference is that I made the same judgment as the Government on that occasion, which is why I supported the programme motion. I am sorry to say this because I have a lot of respect for the hon. Lady, but it feels a bit dog-in-the-manger to make a dramatic point of order at the end of the Committee stage to attempt to gain party political points in an environment in which we had considerable differences of view about the content of the Bill, but, to the best of my knowledge, a collective responsibility to make the timings work.

The hon. Lady also asked why there are guillotines now. I do not think that she needs to look very far. Surely the Government, having been criticised in Committee for not having gone through the business, are bound to take away some of our latitude to operate autonomously. I cite the example of Northern Ireland legislation, which is continuously controversial, often involves constitutional matters and is extremely divisive to the House. Nevertheless, the Whip who is usually in charge of the business, the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Coaker), manages to secure a collective responsibility even at times when, for example, we underestimate the number of hours required in Committee. That occurred with the Northern Ireland (Offences) Bill, which was so controversial that the Government eventually withdrew it. However, there were no complaints about the timings, even though it became patently obvious to both sides that we had underestimated the time that we needed in Committee.

Although I have never been that persuaded about the principle of programming, I have to accept that, in today's environment, the House collectively, on a cross-party basis, has decided to impose programme motions from time to time, and this is one of those occasions. In the context of what we are considering today and tomorrow, it seems reasonable of the Government to have included the guillotines to ensure that important legislation is discussed.

I appeal to all hon. Members and the Minister to ensure that we are sufficiently concise to handle the issues in the time available, because I agree with the hon. Lady that it would be a shame if any of the strings of amendments were abandoned through lack of time. That does not need to happen. We can rehearse the arguments concisely and effectively enough to get through everything that is to be debated, including the controversial elements. For that reason, if the hon. Lady insists on dividing the House, although I am lukewarm about programme motions, I will have little option other than to defend the Government.

Orders of the Day

Government of Wales Bill

[1ST ALLOTTED DAY]

As amended in the Committee, considered.

Clause 7

CANDIDATES AT GENERAL ELECTIONS

4.2 pm

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 4, line 36, leave out subsections (5) and (6) and insert—

'(5) The list must not include a person—

(a) who is included on any other list submitted for the Assembly electoral region or any list submitted for another Assembly electoral region,

(b) who is an individual candidate to be an Assembly member for the Assembly electoral region or another Assembly electoral region,

(c) who is a candidate to be the Assembly member for an Assembly constituency which is not included in the Assembly electoral region, or

(d) who is a candidate to be the Assembly member for an Assembly constituency included in the Assembly electoral region but is not a candidate of the party.

(6) A person may not be an individual candidate to be an Assembly member for the Assembly electoral region if he is—

(a) included on a list submitted by a registered political party for the Assembly electoral region or another Assembly electoral region,

(b) an individual candidate to be an Assembly member for another Assembly electoral region,

(c) a candidate to be the Assembly member for an Assembly constituency which is not included in the Assembly electoral region, or

(d) a candidate of any registered political party to be the Assembly member for an Assembly constituency included in the Assembly electoral region.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 8, in page 4, line 42, at end insert

'(unless section [Person filling constituency vacancy to be eligible as constituency member or regional member at subsequent general election] applies).'.

Amendment No. 9, in page 5, line 8, at end insert

'(unless section [Person filling constituency vacancy to be eligible as constituency member or regional member at subsequent general election] applies).'.

Amendment No. 2, in page 7, line 43 [Clause 11], leave out subsection (8).

Amendment No. 13, in page 90, line 28 [Clause 160], at end insert—

'(8) Section 7 comes into force in accordance with section [Commencement of provisions relating to candidates at general elections].'.

New clause 4—Person filling constituency vacancy to be eligible as constituency member or regional member at subsequent general election—

'A person who has become an Assembly constituency member as a result of an election held under section 10 may be included in a list of candidates for return as Assembly regional members for a particular Assembly electoral region at the subsequent general election even if, at that general election, he is also a candidate to be the Assembly constituency member for an Assembly constituency.'.

New clause 7—Commencement of provisions relating to candidates at general elections—

'(1) Section 7 comes into force on such day after the 2007 election as the Secretary of State may by order appoint.

(2) But no order under subsection (1) may be made unless—

(a) the Secretary of State has undertaken appropriate consultation with—

(i) the Assembly, and

(ii) each political party represented in the Assembly, and

(b) the Electoral Commission has made a report.

(3) No order under subsection (1) may be made unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing the order has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament.'.

Mrs. Gillan: The first group of amendments in the section to be dealt with before the guillotine deals with the position of candidates for the National Assembly for Wales. We debated the matter at some length in Committee, but did not reach any satisfactory conclusion. I am glad that we have the opportunity to re-examine some of the points today. As the Under-Secretary said in his brief speech on the programme motion, there are parts of the Bill with which the Opposition agree. There are several aspects of the Bill, however, to which we fundamentally object. In particular, the proposals in clause 7 are brought into the sharp focus of scrutiny by the amendments.

In speaking to the amendments, I am trying to do one of two things. First, I am seeking to maintain the status quo so that the electoral arrangements, as understood by the people of Wales at the moment, remain the same. If I fail to do that, however, I hope that the option of not introducing those changes until after the Assembly elections in 2007 will give the existing system time to settle down and also afford the Government and the Assembly the opportunity to inform the people of Wales about the proposed changes that they intend to make. There is much evidence showing that people in Wales do not understand the electoral system, let alone the proposals that the Government are now seeking to impose. Conservative Members have argued that clause 7 is a partisan attempt by the Labour party to rig the electoral system to its own advantage.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): The hon. Lady said that there is much evidence that the people of Wales do not understand the current electoral system, but I wonder what evidence she has seen because all the evidence gathered by academics that I have seen indicates exactly the opposite.

Mrs. Gillan: The Electoral Reform Society, the Electoral Commission and the Bevan Foundation report, which I shall discuss later—the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David) successfully introduced the Bevan Foundation report into the debate in Committee—all point to confusion about the system itself. The combination system, which is different from the first-past-the-post system, causes confusion among the electorate.

Chris Bryant: I am not sure whether that is right. In multi-member local government constituencies, people have the right to vote three times for three councillors under the first-past-the-post system. Opinion polls suggest that the number of people who do not use all three votes because they do not understand that they have more than one vote is far higher than the number of people who say that they do not understand the Welsh Assembly voting system.

Mrs. Gillan: I refer the hon. Gentleman to page 8 of the Bevan Foundation report, which Labour Members have prayed in aid. It states that there is strong survey evidence that people do not understand how the system of elections to the National Assembly for Wales works. I shall go into more detail on that point, but I think that the hon. Gentleman must back down.

Chris Bryant indicated dissent.

Mrs. Gillan: The Welsh people have not called for the Government's proposed change to the electoral system. Furthermore, it is notable that the Richard commission, which has produced a substantial piece of work on the situation in Wales, did not come up with the change that the Government are attempting to introduce today.

The Government have deployed the argument that the change was in the Labour manifesto at the general election. That is slightly lame, because if they had the best interests of the people of Wales at heart, they would not have made a bald statement in a manifesto and would at least have conducted some research and examined the issues in Wales, which seem to include confusion about the electoral system itself.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): When probing amendments suggesting that there is confusion about the electoral system were moved in Committee, the hon. Lady did not agree that such confusion exists, because it benefited her party to adopt that position. Now she is telling hon. Members that there is confusion, so which one is it? She has claimed that the system is somehow rigged towards the Labour party, and many Opposition Members have alleged that the system has been gerrymandered, but does she have any evidence on that point, because she has not produced any up to this point?

Mrs. Gillan: I apologise to hon. Members because my voice is gradually fading away and may be reduced to a faint whisper by the end of the debate. I shall pick up those points as I develop my argument.

It is notable that when there was one Labour regional AM we heard no complaints about the system. Now that complaints have been made, we see that there are no Labour regional AMs. That suggests that there is an enormous bias in favour of presenting a political solution instead of one that is good for the people of Wales. When the Welsh Affairs Committee inquired into the Government's White Paper, "Better Governance for Wales", it divided strictly along party lines. The fact that no party other than Labour has picked up the cudgels on this leads me to believe that it is not in the best interests of the people of Wales.

[Mrs. Gillan]

The Electoral Commission is not convinced of the need for change. In its submission to the Welsh Affairs Committee, it concluded:

"In light of the need to encourage voter participation at the Assembly election in 2007, we would caution against any change that is perceived to be partisan and could add to a prevailing distrust of politicians.

On the evidence available to the Commission . . . we do not believe that the case for change has been made out."

I think that the Minister would admit that those words should be taken very seriously; after all, they are from the Government's own commission.

Opposition to the ban was forcefully expressed by the Electoral Reform Society, which concluded:

"We urge the Government to reconsider their proposal to ban dual candidacy, a controversial and divisive argument for which the case has not been adequately made."

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Is the hon. Lady aware of the situation of the leader of the Scottish National party, who, if he stood in a constituency and lost, could then be elected through the list? Not only would a loser become a winner—a loser would become a leader. Is not that a rigged system? He is effectively betting on a three-horse race—he cannot lose.

Mrs. Gillan: I love the way we move seamlessly from Wales to Scotland. I would have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. Gentleman had not this electoral system been devised by the Government. They came up with it, and now they are crying foul.

While my voice holds out, I want to turn to some of the points that were made in Committee. The hon. Member for Caerphilly introduced us to the Bevan Foundation's report, "Public attitudes to dual candidacy in elections to the National Assembly for Wales". I was delighted that he pointed me in the direction of that piece of research. I am hoping that he will intervene on me to answer straightforwardly why, when I asked him how much it cost, who paid for it and where it came from, he did not venture to inform the House that he sponsored it. He argued that it was a completely impartial piece of research—[Interruption.] Is the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) trying to intervene?

Chris Bryant: No, I am just shouting.

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman should settle down—it gets better.

Point 6 of the introduction to the report states:

"The research was sponsored by Wayne David MP."

One would have thought that the hon. Gentleman could have enlightened the House when he was trying to tell us that this was a completely independent piece of research. He must have sat on his hands. He knew that he sponsored this piece of research, yet he did not have the guts to stand up in the House and tell us. I honestly think that he did not want me to read the research, because when we look at the detail we will see what it contains. It is very interesting.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab) rose—

Mrs. Gillan: I give way to the hon. Gentleman to let him tell us why he did not say that he had sponsored it.

Mr. David: This is extremely tedious. If the hon. Lady did not hear my comments during our previous proceedings, she could have read Hansard, which shows that I openly said to hon. Members that I had sponsored the research but that it was independent. Big deal.

4.15 pm

Mrs. Gillan: If the hon. Gentleman reads his contribution at column 112 of Hansard on 30 January, he will realise that it did not reflect the simplicity of the intervention that he has just made.

Let us consider the Bevan Foundation's research. I shall concentrate on the summary and I hope that the hon. Gentleman has a copy because I should like to remind him of its conclusions. It was not based on an enormous sample—indeed, there was "a predominance of people aged over 45 and of those who were either retired or not working for other reasons."

The relative absence of people under 45 and those working full-time means that the results are not statistically representative—they were not intended to be. One wonders why the hon. Gentleman sponsored work that has such a caveat. However, as he has prayed it in aid, it is right to examine the results.

The report states:

"There is little in-depth analysis or empirical evidence to support the various arguments made both for and against dual candidacy".

That is apparent from our discussions. However, the small-scale project aimed to explore whether the public had views on the issue, as is often claimed. The summary continues:

"We found slightly more of the total number of respondents said that dual candidacy was unfair compared with those who felt candidates should be free to stand in both."

I emphasise the word "slightly". That could mean as much as one in a sample of 47.

The summary goes on:

"This suggests that any proposals about dual candidacy—whether to change or retain the current system—need to be based on sound evidence and be mindful of the differing views amongst the public."

I agree with that. It is obvious that the Government have not based the proposals on sound evidence. The summary states:

"This suggests that there should be clarification of the roles of the two types of Assembly member."

We can all agree with that because there is confusion about the roles, not least among Assembly Members. As expected, those views were part of a wider lack of understanding of the electoral process among many people and a division of views about proportional representation.

The hon. Member for Caerphilly, who prayed in aid the report, has played straight into our hands. Again, I emphasise that there is slight evidence that respondents believed that dual candidacy was unfair. It hardly constitutes an overwhelming piece of research to back up the Government's proposals.

Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): Have you any research that you can impart on how—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When I am on my feet, the hon. Lady must sit down. She must not use the second person because when she says "you" she refers to me and I have nothing to do with these matters.

Mrs. James: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Does the hon. Lady have any evidence that the people of Wales are happy with the safety net that we provide for the dual candidates? I have found no evidence of people being fully supportive of the process whereby winners become losers, or, as the Japanese put it, zombies become winners. Has the hon. Lady any facts and figures to impart on that?

Mrs. Gillan: I hope that Assembly Members have noted that the hon. Lady likened them to zombies. [Interruption.] I do not care who called them zombies. The hon. Lady likened them to zombies in the Chamber. The Conservative group is one of the most active and effective groups in the Assembly, so the hon. Lady should be careful before she starts throwing around such words to describe it.

This is all about trying to prove a negative. If the Government are going to change an electoral system that they have only recently introduced, they must do so on the basis of fact, investigation and demand. No such fact, investigation or demand exists, as I am seeking to prove, given the public attitudes to dual candidacy and elections to the National Assembly for Wales expressed in the Bevan Foundation's report, which was commissioned by the hon. Member for Caerphilly.

Mr. David: I am very pleased that the hon. Lady has taken the trouble to read the Bevan Foundation's report. As she knows, I placed a copy in the Library for her to see. As the report states, it is an indicative report that is intended simply to give an indication of the public's attitudes. However, the hon. Lady cannot get away from the fact that its central point is that a majority of the respondents think that the current system is unfair.

Mrs. Gillan: I am unwilling to concede that, because the report found that only "slightly" more of the total number of respondents held that view—

Mr. David: A majority.

Mrs. Gillan: That could be a majority of just one out of the 47 respondents. The hon. Gentleman should read some of the remarks made by those 47 people in the report. I shall not take up the House's time by reading them out now, but I would recommend them to anyone who is interested in the Bill.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): Does the hon. Lady find it curious that Labour Members place such weight on this report, given the small number of respondents it involved? When the Electoral Commission's scientific research was discussed by the Welsh Affairs Committee, Labour Members' response was, "Who are these people? Are they paid? How were they selected?" There was a great deal of scepticism expressed at that time, yet great weight is placed on this piece of research. Is not that strange?

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman and I are of one accord on this. What seems important is whether the Bill suits the Labour party, not whether it suits the people of Wales or contains what is best for the people of Wales. I was at a Scottish Affairs Committee recently at which some eminent people, including Sir John Arbuthnott, were giving evidence. One of the Labour members of the Committee even wanted to know how many degrees Sir John had. I think that that Member was trying to make the point that Sir John was so intelligent that he could not relate to ordinary people. Well, perhaps that was the case, because I believe that Sir John replied that he had 11 or 12 degrees. That certainly put that Labour Member in his place.

The Government have tried to fall back on the old line that there is widespread and systematic abuse—I think that was how the Secretary of State described the situation—in Wales. If the abuse is so widespread and systematic, why has the Secretary of State failed to respond to letters from Nicholas Bourne, the leader of the Conservative group in the Assembly, written on 4 November and 27 January? Those letters contained a request for information about the Secretary of State's assertions. I see that the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Carmarthen, West and South Pembrokeshire (Nick Ainger), is looking slightly blank. Nicholas Bourne's letter of 27 January to the Secretary of State says:

> "I enclose a copy of a letter I sent to you on 4 November 2005, to which I have, as yet, received no response.
> I am concerned that you have made assertions regarding alleged abuse by List Assembly Members of their position in relation to expenses. This is a claim that, as far as I am aware, has never been substantiated.
> If you are making such a claim it is clearly a very serious one".

The letters of 4 November and 27 January from the leader of the Conservative group regarding the systematic abuse that has been prayed in aid in relation to changing the system have not even received a response from the Secretary of State. I hope that a response will now be forthcoming.

Another argument that the Government have used is that the banning of dual candidacy will end the confusion caused by the present system. However, I am not sure how that would follow. The research that I have seen suggests that banning someone from standing in a constituency system or a list system would not address the problem that people fail to understand that there is a first-past-the-post system coupled with a proportional representation system. That is where the sticking point seems to be with the electorate. Clearly, some analysis and research is needed to back up what the Government are trying to do.

[Mrs. Gillan]

I want to deal with the Secretary of State's arguments in Committee. I was particularly interested in the way in which he responded to the debate on clause 7. He said:

"We should start with the facts. Interestingly, the National Assembly for Wales does not support the Opposition proposals for preventing a ban on dual candidature. That is fact No. 1."—[Official Report, 30 January 2006; Vol. 442, c. 122.]

Well, it is not quite fact No.1, because I decided that I would examine the voting and the debate on the relevant amendments to the Bill in the Assembly. If the Secretary of State thinks that the Assembly voted against the idea, he is skating on thin ice. The amendments were only defeated on the casting vote of the Presiding Officer, who was obliged to vote against them under Standing Orders. I do not know how he would have voted had he been free to vote as he wished, but we need only examine the voting of members of his party to discover where his heart might have lain. To say that the National Assembly for Wales does not support the Opposition proposals is therefore to flirt with the truth.

On amendment No. 1, in the name of Lisa Francis, Conservative Assembly Member for Mid and West Wales, the voting was 29 for, 29 against, and 0 abstentions. On amendment No. 5, in the name of Jocelyn Davies, the voting was 29 for, 29 against, 0 abstentions—casting vote. On amendments Nos. 7 and 11, the voting numbers were exactly the same. The Secretary of State's opening gambit in his response therefore takes the biscuit. Given the opportunity of a free vote by the Presiding Officer, we might find that the National Assembly for Wales does not support the Government's proposals. However, the Labour party supports them, and it is its amendments that we are considering.

Labour Members also displayed a lot of partisanship when they said that one of their problems was with list Members setting up rival camps. I am not sure how this change in the system will stop that because there will still be list Members, who will still be able to set up rival camps. The evidence session given by Professor Sir John Arbuthnott and Dr. Nicola McEwan to the Scottish Affairs Committee on Tuesday 14 February, which I attended, provided an interesting insight into the psychology of the Labour party. I heard the Committee Chairman, the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Sarwar), utter the immortal words that are on page 22 of the draft transcript:

"I represent Glasgow Central. I have 11 MSPs interfering in my constituency."

That is the Labour party's attitude to Members of the Scottish Parliament and, I presume, to Assembly Members. That is appalling. We have touched on the real reason for the proposals in the Bill to change the electoral system.

Hywel Williams: Is it not the case that the Labour party is happy for such Members to set up camps as long as they are not in seats that Labour is rightly in danger of losing?

Mrs. Gillan: That is the case. The hon. Gentleman makes the point well. That takes me back to my initial point that this is merely about Labour party advantage, Labour party position and keeping Labour Members. It is not about what is best for Wales and for the people of Wales, which is what Conservative Members want. If the Government are going to make these changes, why not make them later rather than sooner, after a period of reflection or investigation?

Albert Owen: The crux of the Secretary of State's argument was that under the present system an Assembly Member who has been elected on the list and wishes to become a candidate in the constituency puts all the resources into that constituency. The intervention from the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) was interesting. In my constituency, where we have a Labour Member of Parliament and a Plaid Cymru Assembly Member, his party was very worried about the fact that a Conservative list Member would refer to himself as the base in the constituency. The Plaid Cymru intervention is a little unhelpful and I do not think the hon. Lady should associate herself with it.

4.30 pm

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman almost plays into my hands. If it is just a question of behaviour in target seats, why not change the Standing Orders? Why not consider ways around the problem before going for the nuclear option of changing the electoral system? There is no guarantee that the first person on the list, if he is not of a Labour party persuasion in a Labour constituency, will not set himself up in exactly the same way. I think that that is a red herring. A sop is being offered to Labour Members.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): The Government are very keen on consulting. We are told that they are a listening Government. They consult on absolutely everything. They do not take any notice of what is said to them, but they do consult. For example, more than 90 per cent. of respondents opposed the National Offender Management Service, while 0.4 per cent. favoured it. The Government then went ahead with it.

If there is so much evidence out there, why did the Government not go out and consult the people of Wales, and come back with hard evidence which would have informed the debate?

Mrs. Gillan: I am sure that the Minister does not want to be reminded of the National Offender Management Service, but it is true that in that instance there was no consultation worth a row of beans. The Government seem to be falling into exactly the same trap in the case of the merger of police areas. They are not listening to the people of Wales, and the political bullying by the Labour party that is now becoming apparent is the hallmark of their latest term of office.

I am sorry that the Secretary of State is not present as he dealt with these matters in Committee. He said that the Arbuthnott commission would have reached the same conclusion that has resulted in the Government's proposal for a change in the legislation if it had considered what he has called the systematic abuses carried out by list members in Wales.

It was the hon. Member for Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey (Danny Alexander) who drew Sir John Arbuthnott on the point. He said

"I should also point out that the Secretary of State for Wales has said that if the Commission had considered what he called the systematic abuses carried out by list members in Wales, he would have reached the same conclusion that we have, namely that a ban on dual candidacy is the only effective solution. Do you agree with his line of thinking? Is the Welsh situation one you have studied in coming to this conclusion?"

Professor Sir John Arbuthnott responded

"Of course we read the material on Wales. The points the Commission took into account on this important issue are as follows: first of all we actually found no evidence that there was a problem for voters in having dual candidacy, nor incidentally, did the Electoral Commission, who have done their own study of this. The idea that a loser is then elected by another aspect or another branch of the proportional representation system is actually a hangover from the first-past-the-post thinking: those coming second are only losers, the only losers in a majoritarian system. The logic of PR is that you actually use the best people as voted for by the electorate and under a proportional system that will not only be the first-past-the-post candidate. As you are aware, I am pretty concerned that we do this on behalf of citizens. Banning dual candidacy would, if you think about it, actually restrict voter choice and potentially diminish the quality of constituency contests."

I think that Sir John has put to bed the myth that he would have arrived at a different conclusion on Wales if he had studied the situation. He obviously did study the situation and I think that the Secretary of State was wrong to put words into his mouth.

I have talked enough, and other hon. Members wish to speak in this debate for which the Government have allowed only a short time. The Secretary of State is trying to amend the system in a way that many people, including myself, believe is cavalier and partisan, with the aim of keeping Labour party members quiet. The case for change has not been made in any substantial research. The Assembly is not crying out for it—quite the opposite, in fact—and the Secretary of State is moving away from what would be its wishes, given the political complexion of the Presiding Officer. I do not think, therefore, that he can argue that the Assembly has been demanding change. Sir John Arbuthnott looked at the situation in Wales, and concluded that there was no case for change in Scotland in light of the information that it provided. The Bevan Foundation research has been prayed in aid and, although flawed, it showed that there is not an overwhelming demand or case for change.

Why, therefore, are the Government messing around again with the electoral system in Wales in such a precipitate way? Will the Under-Secretary wait until after the 2007 elections at the earliest before embarking on that road? I urge him to look at the amendments that I have tabled and, hopefully, accept one of them. If not, he could wait until the Assembly alters its Standing Orders so that regional and constituency Members can resolve their differences. He could at least initiate an education programme about the electoral system, because the Government have failed to educate the electorate.

Why should Wales once again be an electoral experiment? It has three systems—one for Europe; one for Westminster and local government; and one for the Assembly. The system for the Assembly has only been in place for a short while, and it should be given a chance to work before it is changed again. I notice that it is the system in Wales that is changing, not the one used in Scotland. The proposals are not good for the people of Wales, and as they do not result from overwhelming demand or substantial research they are not good for democracy.

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen) (Lab): I did not intend to speak in this debate until I listened to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), who has not added a great deal to previous debates on this issue. There should be an opportunity to put matters right in the House, as the people of Wales have the right to understand why the Government and the Labour party have introduced the proposals.

The hon. Lady is terribly confused about the electoral system. It was only a couple of weeks ago that we discussed the top-up system on the Floor of the House. She suggested that we ought not to change it, because it is too early to do so, and she has repeated that assertion today. She said, too, that the Labour party introduced the system in the 1997 referendum, so we should not change it. The purpose of the Bill, however, is to reflect on what has happened in the past few years to see whether improvements can be made to the way in which our country is governed in Wales. That point was completely and utterly missed by the hon. Lady.

There is something else that the hon. Lady has failed to grasp. When we debated the system of top-up Assembly Members she rejected the consultation that my hon. Friends and I proposed so that we could consider whether we should revise a system which, I believe, has been discredited. Today, however, she said that the system was confusing. In our earlier debate, she asked me to talk about e-mails from my constituents about the electoral system. I remind her that hon. Members who represent Welsh constituencies do not need to look at e-mails, as we talk to our constituents in markets, pubs, meetings and churches, and they tell us how they feel about different public policy issues, including confusing systems. If she went to Wales a little more than she has done in the past she would undoubtedly hear the same points being made.

Mrs. Gillan: As I spent the first 11 years of my life in Wales, the right hon. Gentleman might say that I have spent a considerable amount of time in Wales. If he is telling me that conversations in markets and pubs are the basis for this Labour party legislation on the electoral system, I am very worried for this Labour Government because they have moved away from the evidence base that they always vaunted so loudly. Where is the evidence? There is none.

Mr. Murphy: I do not live in fantasy land. I live in Wales, which the hon. Lady does not. I do not know whether, during the first 11 years of her life, people were taking about these issues in Wales. She was certainly too young to discuss them. All the references to Professor Arbuthnott, electoral commissions and electoral reform societies do not take account of the experiences of elected Members from Wales who talk to people in their constituencies who are interested in these matters. Today, she is saying that the system is confusing. A fortnight ago, she said that it was not. She has to make up her mind what she thinks about the system.

[Mr. Murphy]

Of course, the system is one that the hon. Lady's party traditionally would have rejected. In fact, I agree with most members of her party that the first-past-the-post system is the best. However, the current system has benefited her party. Under the first-past-the-post system, the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) would have been the only Conservative Member in the National Assembly for Wales.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for reminding us that the Conservative party opposes proportional representation, but we play by the rules that are set. I would have been quite happy to be the only member of the Conservative party to be elected under first past the post. I am sure that most of my colleagues, who are supporters of the first-past-the-post system themselves, would have been pleased to see me there.

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman had better have a word with the shadow Secretary of State for Wales. She seems to be a great advocate of proportional representation—at least that is the impression that the House gained some moments ago.

Mrs. Gillan: A moment ago, the right hon. Gentleman said that we should listen to the elected Members for Wales. Therefore, why does he not listen to the Assembly? The vote was tied at 29 to 29; the casting vote was made by the Presiding Officer on a Standing Order. Surely, therefore, the Government are not listening to the elected Members. The right hon. Gentleman is going against the will of the elected Members in Wales.

Mr. Murphy: I listen to elected Members of the Assembly all the time. The vote that the hon. Lady referred to was presumably split on traditional party lines. Of course, a fair number of those who voted were Members who were elected on the top-up system anyway. The point that I am trying to make, however, is that to try to deny that there is unease or dissatisfaction about the system is wrong.

There is a much more significant point, however, which my hon. Friends have already raised: this was a manifesto commitment. It was clear as day, in black and white. All of us who were Labour candidates in Wales at the last general election fought on a manifesto that said that we would change the position on dual candidacy.

When the Bill goes to the other place, I hope that Members of the House of Lords will reflect on that issue, too. This proposal has not come out of the blue. The reason for the change is that, initially, the Labour party conference agreed by an overwhelming majority that the change had to take place. That was put in a manifesto to the people of Wales. We won on that manifesto. Therefore, it is the duty of Labour Members in this House of Commons to put that forward. When the proposal goes up the Corridor to the House of Lords, I hope that it will realise that, if it rejects it, it will reject a Labour party manifesto commitment that was crystal clear at the last general election.

Mr. Llwyd: I am not sure what the position of the right hon. Gentleman was, but his party clearly did not consider the manifesto commitment on top-up fees to be sacrosanct. One wonders why this particular one should be sacrosanct. [Interruption.] One or two Labour Members supported it, but not the bulk of them.

Mr. Murphy: The hon. Gentleman can pick and choose from a list of policies if he wants to, but today we are discussing dual candidacy, and Labour's policy on dual candidacy was included in the manifesto. I fought on that manifesto commitment, as did other members of my party.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The right hon. Gentleman is trying to send to the other place the message that, because this was a manifesto commitment, it should respect it. Does he not accept that it is entirely inconsistent for him to expect others to honour that commitment, given that, as the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) rightly pointed out, the Government themselves broke a fundamental promise on student funding? The right hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Murphy: The point is being made that this policy simply appeared out of the blue and was dreamed up at the last moment, but it was not like that. The people of Wales knew precisely what the Labour party's policy was and what they were voting for, and in any event, it is a sensible one. If people do not like a particular Assembly Member who has been elected as a constituency Member through the first-past-the-post system, they can vote that Member out of the Assembly. However, if, as happened in Clwyd, West and other constituencies, someone chooses to stand dually—in the top-up AM list and in the constituency—and loses, they can still get back into the Assembly. I am sure that if we asked any of our constituents whether that is fair, they would say that it is not.

Another point that we must ram home constantly is that few top-up Assembly Members concentrate on safe seats. They often concentrate their activities in marginal seats: ones that they think they are most likely to win at the forthcoming election. That may be politically sensible—I am not saying that it is not—but is that the role of an AM who is a top-up Member? No, it is not. The role of an AM who represents a region of Wales is to represent that region equally and properly. That sometimes happens, but often it does not because of the concentration of political activity in marginal seats. Such concentration distorts and perverts the reason for having top-up AMs in Wales.

The best solution is to do away with the system altogether and to come up with a different one. That is a debate for another day, but today we are debating an issue that the vast majority of people in Wales understand: doing away with an unfairness. They were told about this policy during the general election, when a clear manifesto commitment was given. I urge the House to follow the wise advice that my hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen, West and South Pembrokeshire (Nick Ainger)—he is not a junior Minister but the Under-Secretary of State for Wales—will give us when he winds up: to vote against these amendments.

Lembit Öpik: The right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) said that the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) added little that is new to this debate, but given that we have already discussed this issue comprehensively, it is hardly surprising that we should go over some of the same ground. I was slightly surprised by the position taken by the right hon. Gentleman, who seems to be arguing as his core case that because this policy was a manifesto commitment, others need to honour it. As I made clear in my intervention, and as the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) did in his, it is very difficult to take that argument seriously, given that the Government themselves do not respect their manifesto promises to this country. Such an approach certainly does not add any credence to whatever claims may be made that these changes will increase the democratic effectiveness of Wales as a nation.

I shall go through some of the points that have been made, some of which, hopefully, are new. First, we must recognise that there is an attractiveness in separating the constituency and list candidatures, as outlined by the right hon. Gentleman. That looks like a nice way of making it more difficult for opposing candidates from other parties to campaign in marginal seats. Indeed, I would go further: I have some experience of this issue, having observed what goes on in Montgomeryshire. Simply to argue for a change because it makes it easier for the incumbent has nothing to do with the democracy of the system. Surely the right hon. Gentleman does not think that it is justified to change the system to make it more difficult for other parties to marshal their resources and provide significant competition in a given constituency. Anyone who did that would be doing what the Government claim they are not doing, and that is gerrymandering the system.

Chris Bryant: If that were the case, I would wholeheartedly agree with the hon. Gentleman. However, Labour Members find it distasteful that the three Opposition parties who oppose the change cannot accept the fundamental principle that losers should not become winners. They hide the fact that the main reason they oppose the change is that they do not have enough members who want to stand and would be decent enough candidates to fill both the list and the constituency vacancies.

Lembit Öpik: The second part of those remarks is simply vexatious mischief. If the change goes through, we will see whether the parties have sufficient candidates. However, the change will harm the minor parties. It will necessarily cause a convergence towards larger parties and it is clear from what the hon. Gentleman says that he is pleased about that. He thinks that it is reasonable to make it difficult for start-up parties to do well in the Welsh system. The more important point is the hon. Gentleman's claim that it is fundamentally wrong that losers should become winners.

Albert Owen: The hon. Gentleman used the term "gerrymandering", and the shadow Secretary of State for Wales talked about "rigging". My understanding of gerrymandering is that it involves clear political gain for the party that undertakes it. What is the political gain for the Labour party from the changes? The hon. Gentleman must produce some evidence if he wishes to use such strong terminology.

Lembit Öpik: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question lies in the comments by the right hon. Member for Torfaen. He is an effective parliamentarian and it has always been an honour to work with him, but he highlighted his belief that the change is necessary to reduce the likelihood of various parties focusing their resources in marginal seats. I am happy to give way to the right hon. Gentleman if I have misinterpreted what he said, but I am fairly sure that that is the meaning of what he said. We may have a genuine difference of view, but I do not think that that is a good enough justification for altering the democratic system that pertains. It is suggesting that the present system may cause discomfort and heat to the incumbent in a marginal seat, and that is a sufficiently good justification to pray in aid of this change.

Mr. Murphy: My point was that the system distorts the purpose of top-up Members. When the House debated the Government of Wales Act 1998, the purpose of those Members was not only to represent the proportion of votes for parties, but to represent all the parts of the region equally. That has been perverted and distorted because political resources are put into those constituencies where the party can go for both seats.

Lembit Öpik: In his heart of hearts, the right hon. Gentleman surely cannot pretend that this change has anything to do with forcing the regional list Members to represent their regions rather than their immediate locality—[Interruption.] Labour Members, including Front Benchers, seem to object to that, but I look forward to hearing the Minister's explanation of how this mechanism will ensure that individuals who have been elected as list regional Members will not tend to use their resources of time and money to focus on the locality within which they live. If the Minister is suggesting that is the reason, why has it taken five days of debate to reach that justification? Why was it merely a sedentary response to my comments?

Chris Bryant rose—

Lembit Öpik: I will give way to the hon. Gentleman in a minute, but I want to respond to the more interesting of the points that he made earlier on, which also ties in with something that the right hon. Member for Torfaen said. The hon. Gentleman said that losers should not be winners. What a dramatic change for the Labour party: losers should not be winners. Where does it say that manifesto commitments secured by only a third of the popular vote mean that a party has the justification, in any democratic sense, to force through such provisions?

Labour Members know as well as I do that two thirds of the British population voted for parties that were not Labour, yet when they are talking about democracy that fact seems to go out of the window. Today, it is convenient for Members sanctimoniously to masquerade as keepers of the democratic process, but we should never forget the complete contradiction in the Government's justifying their proposed changes on the basis that there is some kind of democratic deficit in Wales, while forcing through these and many other provisions when they very well know that most of the electorate voted against their manifesto.

Chris Bryant: The hon. Gentleman is getting into what the House of Lords should do to legislation from this place. His argument seems entirely consistent with what other Liberal Democrats and Conservative Front Benchers have said since the last general election—that they have no intention of standing by the Salisbury convention because they believe that we did not properly win that election. The hon. Gentleman is introducing a second version of losers shall be winners.

Earlier, the hon. Gentleman said that he felt that I was urging that we have a system that disbenefited smaller parties, but the present system gives smaller parties an extraordinary advantage. My experience in south Wales is that smaller parties are smaller parties because they do not command the support of the people of Wales, and I do not think that we should give them an additional leg up.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman is obviously beginning to panic about how the upper House may interpret this debate—as well he might. Sadly, and increasingly of late, the unelected upper House remains the last stand between the authoritarian autocracy of the Government and the interests of the people and democracy as a whole—

Chris Bryant: Autocracy?

Lembit Öpik: Yes, autocracy—[Interruption.] I will not be drawn on that. The hon. Gentleman should remember that English is my second language—

Chris Bryant: Not Greek?

Lembit Öpik: Greek is certainly not my second language, but English is, so the hon. Gentleman should cut me some slack if he has issues with my terminology.

I want to focus on the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that losers cannot be winners. Today and in previous debates, he and others have claimed as justification that the public in Wales want the proposed changes. However, just as two thirds of the British population as a whole voted against the Labour party in the 2005 general election, so too did a majority of electors in Wales. It is thus obvious that if Labour Members claim democracy as justification for making these changes to our electoral process they are contradicting their own arguments. Most people in Wales who used their vote did not support that manifesto commitment. I do not understand why it is so difficult for Government Members to grasp the contradiction between what the public said then and what the Government are saying now.

Incidentally, I do not want to stray too far from the debate, but if the Government are suddenly so concerned about what the people think, how is it that they ignored the obvious anecdotal judgments of the public about the war in Iraq, about the anti-terrorist legislation or about something that we have discussed already—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will take the advice that he has just given to himself.

Lembit Öpik: I value the person who gave that advice, so I will take it and I will stop there. I simply say in general terms that the Government cannot have it both ways. They cannot say that they will take the advice on one occasion and not on another.

We hear an age-old argument about the general public's confusion. We are told that they do not understand how the system works. Once again, I simply ask the Government to provide some solid hard-core data to show that people who voted either in the most recent Welsh Assembly election or perhaps even in the one before have genuinely said, "If I had understood the system better, I would have changed my vote."

Mr. Llwyd: The right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) said that, when he spoke to people in the pubs about the issue, there was a certain amount of confusion. Perhaps they were confused because they were in the pubs anyway.

Lembit Öpik: And 24-hour drinking will not help the case of the right hon. Member for Torfaen. While sort of thanking the hon. Gentleman for his intervention, I want to point out that hon. Members are mixing up two things when they cite the public's alleged confusion as a justification for this change, which is nothing to do with changing the list and constituency system. All it will do is prevent individuals from exercising their human right to stand for election on the list as well as in a constituency. At the heart of it, there is nothing very complicated about our difference of view.

To summarise, it happens that it will be convenient in my constituency if the amendment is accepted, but that does not make it right. It is unquestionably convenient for some hon. Members to consider making it more difficult for their opponents; but, once again, that is not a good enough reason to monkey with the democratic system. The greatest irony of all is that the provision will make almost no difference in the way that the Government intend, but it will make a significant difference to the opportunity for individuals to express their democratic right to stand for election on the list and in a constituency.

Mrs. Gillan: Does the hon. Gentleman intend to join me, my party and Plaid Cymru Members in the Lobby if I ask for votes on amendments Nos. 1 and 2?

Lembit Öpik: To raise the suspense, I will come to that in just a minute.

To finish off, I ask the Minister to reflect on what he is asking us to do today. Is he really so sure that he will achieve the intended goals and that, if we have such a debate again in the Chamber in four years' time, he will be able to point to evidence and say, "Look at all the things we cleared up"? I simply do not believe that. I do not believe that he really believes it either. This is a sop to bitter Labour Assembly Members who are concerned about the trouble that the Opposition parties cause in their constituencies. Therefore, I suggest that if the Government are serious about democracy rather than opportunism, they will think again. To answer the hon. Lady's question, if she chooses to divide the House on the issue, the Liberal Democrats will unquestionably support her amendment.

BEST COPY AVAILBLE

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Opposition Members have repeatedly alleged that the proposal to disbar candidates from standing for election on the list and in constituencies is in some way to the party political advantage of the Labour party. I rise to suggest that that is entirely incorrect and that we have heard no evidence to that effect at all. On the contrary, one group will be disproportionately affected adversely if the proposal is accepted: Labour Assembly Members.

Labour Assembly Members are the largest group of directly elected Members and, if the proposal goes through, they will be prevented from using the safety net that exists under the current system for constituency Members who wish to preserve their position by remaining on the list.

David T.C. Davies: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that Opposition parties are being extraordinarily politically generous to the Labour party by suggesting that the system should not be changed, as if it is changed, it will be to the disbenefit of the Labour party? Does that not prove that we are acting from the highest possible motives?

Ian Lucas: With due respect to the hon. Gentleman, when someone—particularly him—puts that argument to me, I immediately move to preserve my pockets.

Mark Tami: (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): To reinforce my hon. Friend's point, the Assembly Member, Carl Sargeant, who represents the same area as me, would, under our present system, be No. 1 on the list, as well as standing for the seat, which would obviously put him in a strong position to retain his presence in the Assembly, but he supports giving that up.

Ian Lucas: My hon. Friend is right. In north Wales, there are a number of individuals in Labour seats—some of whom are Ministers—who have very small majorities. Those are the individuals who are most at risk of losing their seats. They will not have the safety net that he described if the proposal goes through.

The Opposition, who seem to believe that the mere repetition of an argument somehow gives it logical weight, must concede that they have produced no evidence whatsoever at any stage in this extremely long and detailed debate that the proposals are to the party political advantage of the Labour party.

Mr. Llwyd: I have heard the Secretary of State make the same point that the hon. Gentleman is making: Labour constituency Members who might be in marginals will not have the luxury of being on the list. However, looking at the voting trends in 1997 and 2001, that is an irrelevance to Labour because it would not get any seats on the list.

Ian Lucas: The hon. Gentleman should wait for the outcome of the election, when he will discover that Labour will reassert and extend its current position. I am confident of that.

Lembit Öpik: That involves a slight contradiction: if Labour does even better, it is even less likely to win seats on the list.

Ian Lucas: But it will gain more constituency seats.

My next point concerns the placement of constituency offices by list Members. With due respect to the Opposition parties, they are confused about the role of Assembly Members, which is to serve their constituents. That is the role that they should fulfil when they are elected. It is not the role of an Assembly Member, or a Member of Parliament, to campaign for an individual political party at public expense. Hon. Members know very well that there are strict regulations in the House about the spending that we incur and what it can be used for. I have been concerned by some pronouncements from Opposition Members that suggest that it is in order to use public money to campaign in individual constituencies for the benefit of political parties. That is at odds with the long-standing conventions and rules of this place and I have little doubt that it is also at odds with the conventions and rules that apply in the Assembly.

It is the role of Assembly Members to represent their constituents. For list Assembly Members, that means representing, to the best of their ability, all the people in the region. It is not appropriate for them cynically to place offices to their own political campaigning advantage in individual seats. I have seen that in my constituency, where Plaid Cymru, when I was first elected, had an office in my constituency. That Assembly Member moved the office to the Clwyd, West constituency shortly before the last Assembly elections. I believe that that was not unconnected with the fact that that individual was a candidate in that constituency.

Mrs. Gillan: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the answer is that regional Members should have an office in every constituency? The situation would then be even-handed. Regional Members would then be representing the regions that he says they should be representing. A Member of the European Union Parliament can open an office wherever he wants within his constituency. Since the Government entered office, that applies from Buckinghamshire down to Brighton and includes the whole of Wales. I think that the hon. Gentleman is misunderstanding the roles of our elected Members. Should he not be pleased that a regional Member can open an office in his constituency and give more representation to the people, instead of being such a dog in the manger? Or is he like the hon. Member for Glasgow, Central (Mr. Sarwar), who says that he has 11 MSPs interfering in his constituency?

Ian Lucas: I am surprised that such an experienced Member should make such a protracted and ineffective intervention. I fully understand the role of Assembly Members. If the hon. Lady had been paying attention to what I said earlier, she would understand that my argument was that the role of Assembly Members was to represent individuals within a constituency. If it is Conservative party policy to suggest that every Assembly Member in a region should be entitled to have an office in each individual constituency, perhaps the general electorate should be told that. That may influence people in casting their vote in the next Assembly elections.

Mark Tami: There are Assembly offices in north Wales. Does my hon. Friend think that it would be a good idea that Members should have an office there rather than wasting taxpayers' money having them where they obviously choose to target certain seats?

Ian Lucas: The essence of my point is that Assembly Members should represent the people in their constituency and not use public money for party campaigning and for political purposes. It is in this respect that the helpful memorandum from Leanne Wood of Plaid Cymru was so informative. The memo makes it clear what such expenses have been used for in the past.

I am an old-fashioned type of Member. I believe that it is the role of public representatives to represent each individual constituent, regardless of party political affiliation, to the best of their ability. Accordingly, I believe that the proposal before us will help each individual Member to fulfil that role in a better way.

Mr. Llwyd: I shall comment on what the hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) said about what Leanne Wood had or had not included in her letter. Let us remind ourselves that she was fully exonerated by the Assembly Committee. There is no point in the hon. Gentleman shaking his head, or perhaps there is, because that is the sort of bloke that he is. The point is that Leanne Wood was fully exonerated, and that should be placed on record. We have to dwell on this issue to fill a void, because there is no real reason for the change other than narrow party political gain. It is astonishing that he has to pray in aid a young woman who has been exonerated for what she said already. I give way to the sponsor of the Bevan Foundation report.

5.15 pm

Mr. David: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I am very proud of that report. He referred to Leanne Wood AM. Does he think she was right or wrong to say what she said?

Mr. Llwyd: A certain gentleman from Wales was recently on "Question Time". He was asked about matters which he said were dealt with in this place, and he had no opinion on those matters. What we are discussing is a devolved matter. I have no opinion on it. Sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Opening the debate, the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) mentioned the Richard commission. It produced an excellent piece of work. Eighteen months of deliberation, evidence taking and examination of all aspects of the governance of Wales resulted in a very useful report. I shall not dwell on it. My party's view is obvious: its recommendations should have been implemented.

Despite examining all aspects of Welsh governance and taking hundreds of pages of evidence from dozens of witnesses, the report made no such recommendation as the proposal under discussion. The Richard commission considered how many Members there should be in the Assembly and favoured increasing the membership. As we know, the commission recommended primary powers at the next stage, but it made no recommendation along these lines.

The commission was better placed at that time to look into everything. Everyone who wished to give evidence, from all political parties and none, was allowed to give evidence. That was a model way of dealing with the subject. Curiously, no one seems to have given evidence along the lines that hon. Gentlemen are arguing. Had that been the case, it would have been included in the report and the commission would have reached some conclusion about it. If there was the kind of concern that the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) encounters in the pubs that he obviously frequents, the commission would clearly have made some recommendation. We have heard nothing about the matter from the Richard commission, so that concern could not have been expressed.

I have a great regard for the right hon. Gentleman, who says that he has picked up on such concern when he visits his constituents. I can straightforwardly and honestly say that during my travels throughout Wales in the past seven or eight years, the matter has not been broached with me. I will admit that on occasion, one or two people have expressed some confusion about the new system, especially early on, but never from 1997 to the present day has anyone said to me, "This is unfair." I say that in all honesty. I have not heard it. Had I heard it, I would relay it to the House, as it would inform the debate. It has not happened, even during our debates over the past weeks.

Many people out there follow our debates, and they have not seen fit to raise the issue, even now. If there was such unfairness as is alleged, surely during the debate somebody would have expressed some opinion to that effect, perhaps in a letter column or in a local newspaper. Had such a complaint appeared in a local newspaper, I have no doubt that the Government would have used it in the debate today. The truth is that there is no evidence whatsoever, although I accept entirely what the right hon. Gentleman says. He is a truthful man and there may be some confusion on Torfaen. He would not mislead the House, of that I am sure, but I tell him, equally honestly, that I have never had the matter broached with me.

Mr. Paul Murphy: The issue that I have addressed both today and some weeks ago is that the system with which we now elect our Assembly Members is confusing in terms of accountability—who represents what and how people can be elected for different places. Generally, the system is confusing for our electors. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the issues that we have been discussing for the past three or four weeks are not generally on everybody's lips in our constituencies. I am not saying for one second that they are, but people who are interested in such matters express dismay at what they see.

Mr. Llwyd: As I said, the right hon. Gentleman and myself are as one on the fact there has been some confusion about the system, especially early on. I admit that, but I also point out that, in the past few years, in the run-up to the previous election and since, I have heard nothing along those lines, although there was confusion to begin with.

On the so-called evidence that has been produced by the Bevan Foundation, we have been through all these matters before on 30 January. The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham has given an excellent synopsis of the rather threadbare Bevan Foundation report. We are told that the report is thoroughly independent and that the Bevan Foundation is politically unaligned. If anybody can listen to that suggestion without laughing, there must be something wrong because it is clearly nothing short of a front for the Labour party.

Mr. David: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that there are members of Plaid Cymru in the Bevan Foundation?

Mr. Llwyd: Yes, and one member of Plaid Cymru asked for the annual accounts and was refused them. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] The hon. Gentleman flew into that one. All I shall say is that a sample of 47 people is about as useful as a pair of paper socks, as it does not take us anywhere at all. The process is not scientific. I have heard programmes on which the hon. Gentleman has said about a political sample, "Oh, this is a sample of only 500; it is not indicative of anything." Well, 47 is not exactly persuasive. For all I know, some of the 47 had been in the pub that has been mentioned and were confused before they started. Who knows?

Mrs. Gillan: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that some of the narrative in the report is interesting? At one stage, it states that a substantial minority of respondents supported dual candidacy and commented that it was fair for people to have a second chance and that it gave voters a choice and spread power. The report says that it was regarded as part of the democratic system and essentially as not a problem. I hope that he will join me in the Lobby if we vote on the amendment.

Mr. Llwyd: Absolutely. We are fixed in our view that the premise is unfair and that the case has simply not been made. I recall comments made by the Secretary of State, who is not present, about Sir James Arbuthnott and what would have happened if he had been aware of the Welsh scene. The hon. Lady dealt with that point, so I shall not repeat it, but I think that it was appalling to make such assertions in respect of a highly regarded academic such as Sir James. It was not proper to pray in aid such sneering remarks to try to put together a cogent and believable case—a case that has clearly not been made. The hon. Lady also referred to what was said in response to such assertions, which was definite and clear. We can forget about that strand of the argument in support of this specious and rather nasty change in electoral practice.

The Secretary of State has not been exactly forthcoming in giving good reasons to support the proposed change in the law and he was not very good on police amalgamations either. Both examples show an abject failure to advance a credible case. I have to ask this question: what is the point of the Electoral Commission? Why do we have one? What is the remit of the electoral commissioner and why was he recently reappointed to that remunerated office at public expense? I may be wrong, but I thought that the electoral commissioner was there to ensure safeguards and fair play for all involved in the political system, regardless of party allegiance.

We all know that the electoral commissioner is an even-handed and fair-minded man who dealt with all parties equally when he was involved in the broadcasting scene. His report is definite that there is no case for change, and it contains some strong remarks, including saying that that particular issue did not figure in the extensive research:

> "We asked a whole series of questions and sought unprompted replies and this issue did not arise".

That ties in with my point. The report continues:

> "what concerns us is that there is no evidence whatever in the White Paper to back up this proposal. There is no evidence at all to back up this proposal and therefore we came to the conclusion that we think that the case for change has not been made".

Mr. Paul Murphy: The hon. Gentleman has prayed in aid various people in Wales, including Glyn Mathias and Lord Richard, who has said that there > "is something wrong in a situation in which five people can stand in Clwyd, none of them can be elected, and then they all get into the Assembly. On the face of it that does not make sense".

Many people in Wales think that that does not make sense. What is the difference between what Lord Richard said and what Glyn Mathias said, and which one of them does the hon. Gentleman support?

Mr. Llwyd: It is a question of research and evidence. Lord Richard expressed his personal opinion before the Welsh Affairs Committee, but his report does not refer to the subject. Returning to my opening point, I find it strange that nobody raised the question in the 18 months of consideration, but that is by the by.

I will not labour the point with further quotations: suffice to say that Dr. Scully and Dr. Richard Wyn Jones from Aberystwyth have used strident language in stating that the measure looks like a purely party political move by the Labour party, and the evidence from Barry Winestrobe, reader in law at Napier university, is very clear, too. We did not receive any evidence in Committee, apart from the fabled Bevan Foundation report, and frankly we have not received any evidence today. In Committee, I asked the right hon. Member for Torfaen to bring the paperwork showing his constituents' concerns. I would not and do not doubt his word, but it would interesting to see some extrinsic evidence supporting the point made by Labour Members.

Mr. Murphy: I invite the hon. Gentleman to come to "The Mount" in Cwmbran on Friday night, where we can discuss the matter.

Mr. Llwyd: That is a kind offer, and I must look at my diary—I may well be going on a fact-finding tour on Friday evening.

The change has not been proven to be necessary. It will benefit the Labour party and it will disadvantage all other parties. Dual candidature is acceptable in other countries—in some countries, people are expected to stand both in a constituency and on a list—but it has suddenly become wrong in Wales. It has probably become wrong in Wales because Labour Members have done the sums and realised that they will not get anywhere in the National Assembly without cooking the books. However, I tell them that even after cooking the books, they will not get anywhere in 2007.

5.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): We have heard Opposition Members claim that this measure is partisan, gerrymandering, rigged, fixed and so on, yet not one has been able to provide any evidence whatsoever.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) asked why the ban on dual candidacy will apply in Wales whereas other countries with the additional member system do not ban it. He has not done his research. It applies in Ukraine, which people seem to laugh at—[Laughter.] They laugh again. It also applies in Thailand and Mexico.

Very few countries have the additional member system, so there is not a great deal of evidence. Independent commissions in New Zealand and in Canada have raised substantial issues in relation to dual candidacy.

David T.C. Davies: Will the Minister give way?

Nick Ainger: No, because I have only six more minutes.

In New Zealand, public opinion research conducted by the independent review committee appointed to examine the electoral system found:

"One key criticism was that it was possible for MPs to be defeated in electorate contests but returned to the House through their position on the list."

In New Brunswick, the independent commission endorsed the ban on dual candidacy, saying:

"The Commission heard that in some jurisdictions where candidates are able to run simultaneously on both ballots, voters are displeased with the case where a candidate is not successful in a single member constituency, but is elected anyway by virtue of being placed on the top of a party's list."

That is some of the evidence that is available, but there is more. My right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) quoted Lord Richard on people not liking losers becoming winners. More than that, Lord Carlile, the predecessor of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), said:

"I am sure that many in Wales will welcome . . . the removal of the absurd dual candidacy opportunity."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 June 2005; Vol. 672, c. 1217.]

What about a Conservative peer? Lord Crickhowell, the former Tory Secretary of State for Wales, said:

"The present arrangements are really pretty indefensible".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 June 2005; Vol. 672, c. 1216.]

A wide range of opinion across the political spectrum recognises that it is wrong.

Mrs. Gillan rose—

Nick Ainger: The hon. Lady is aware that I have to wind up by 5.36 pm. She had better be extremely brief, given that she spoke for more than half an hour.

Mrs. Gillan: That is because I feel strongly on the subject. I just wanted to quote some of the good people of Caerphilly, who say:

"It is good that people have more than one chance.";

"They should be free to stand in both ballots—that seems fair enough.";

"That means that the power is spread out which can make more of a difference in the end."

Mr. David: They are in a minority.

Nick Ainger: Absolutely. As my hon. Friend says from a sedentary position, they are in a minority. Does the hon. Lady want me to quote the others? For example:

"I think it is unfair . . . it's like people can sneak in the back door.";

"It doesn't seem right that they can stand for both somehow. Makes it too confusing for everyday people.";

"They should choose perhaps. They should have to decide.";

"You don't have two bites of the cherry."

Those are the quotes from the Bevan Foundation report that the hon. Lady did not use.

We had a good debate in Committee, where we spent more than two and a half hours discussing the matter. We have now debated it for a considerable time. Let me deal with some of the amendments briefly.

I urge my hon. Friends to oppose amendment No. 1. The ban on dual candidacy was a manifesto commitment and the amendment would reinstate the status quo. That means that dual candidacy and all that that entails would continue.

Amendments Nos. 8 and 9 and new clause 4 would also contradict the manifesto commitment, for which clause 7 provides, by allowing a candidate who has been elected to fill a constituency vacancy at a by-election to stand as both a constituency candidate and a regional list candidate at the subsequent general election. They go further and would enable candidates to stand on a regional list and in any constituency, even outside the region. That would not happen even under the current arrangements.

Amendment No. 2 would enable any candidate who was on a regional list to stay on it and fill a regional vacancy if one occurred. As drafted, it would even cover candidates whose return was void, but I take it that the intention was to cover those who decide to stand in a by-election. Voters clearly do not understand how defeated constituency candidates can be elected through the back door on their party's regional list. The new provision will restore voters' democratic right to reject a constituency candidate. That is as important as the right to elect a candidate but some hon. Members do not appear to appreciate that.

The current system undermines electoral confidence at a time when we need to increase voter turnout. The proposals would affect all parties equally, not least three members of the Assembly Cabinet who stand to lose their seats if there is a significant swing against them, with no parachute, which Conservative Members demand.

As I said, criticism of dual candidacy has come from across the political spectrum. I therefore ask the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) to withdraw the amendment.

Mrs. Gillan: I have listened to the Under-Secretary and I disagree with him. He has not made his case and I should therefore like to press the amendment to a Division.

It being two hours after the commencement of proceedings on the programme motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put forthwith the Question already proposed from the Chair, pursuant to Order [this day].

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 205, Noes 283.

REMUNERATION: SUPPLEMENTARY

Clause 23

OATH OR AFFIRMATION OF ALLEGIANCE

Mr. Llwyd: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 14, line 15, after 'affirmation)', insert

'or in the form of the Assembly Oath set out in subsection (1A)'.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 21, in page 14, line 16, at end insert—

'(1A) The wording of the Assembly Oath shall be—

"I do solemnly swear to discharge the responsibilities required of me to the best of my abilities and faithfully serve the people of Wales whom I here represent".'.

New clause 5—Oath to be taken or affirmation to be made in public—

'An oath required by section 23 or 55 is to be taken (or the corresponding affirmation made) in public.'.

Mr. Llwyd: My hon. Friends and I have tabled amendments Nos. 20 and 21, which are self-explanatory and provide an alternative oath for incoming Members of the National Assembly for Wales. Amendment No. 21 provides the wording for such an oath:

"I do solemnly swear to discharge the responsibilities required of me to the best of my abilities and faithfully serve the people of Wales whom I . . . represent".

That is a modern approach to the swearing of an oath. The sovereignty of the people of Wales dictates that elected Members of the National Assembly are voted in by the citizens of Wales, so an alternative oath should be implemented. Ultimately, that may be a matter for the National Assembly itself, but we thought that it would be useful to hold such a debate now. I have nothing further to add, but I am sure that other hon. Members will wish to make a contribution. These are probing amendments, and I can tell the Minister that I do not wish to press them to a vote.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): I do not support the amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) because, as I said in Committee, I have experience of the Scottish Parliament and am aware that a great deal of legislation is based on bringing Assembly procedures in line with those used in the Scottish Parliament. I do not know how many Members have followed in detail the work of the Scottish Parliament in the past six years, but when swearing the prescribed Oath, members of fringe parties often seek to perform stunts by delivering another oath or affirmation. On one occasion, a Member sought to write a message for the wider public on their hand during the Oath-taking ceremony. I do not accept that such behaviour is worthy of Members of either the Scottish Parliament or the Welsh Assembly. There is no suggestion in the amendments that such activities are planned, but the wording of amendment No. 21 is very close to the wording that members of the Scottish National party have attempted to use in the Scottish Parliament. If Members do not wish to swear the oath to Her Majesty, I do not understand why they cannot be satisfied with the ordinary affirmation procedure, rather than seeking to bring forward some new procedure, which does not add anything to either the process or the solemnity of the duties that they are undertaking.

I wish for a change to be made in regard to the swearing of the oath or affirmation in public. I can see no reason why the ceremony should not be held in public. Indeed, if Members were to engage in public in the sort of antics that I have described, I think that the wider general public would see the respect, or lack of it, with which they treated the institution. Therefore, I, together with other colleagues, have tabled new clause 5, which would require the oath to be taken in public. I hope that the Minister will not have difficulty accepting such a proposal.

Lembit Öpik: Obviously, it would be a free vote if this matter were divided on in the House, but I understand that the amendment was tabled by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) in order to have a debate. That is a legitimate aim.

Speaking in a personal capacity, I have to say that I quite like the Queen and I hope she likes me. In case she reads this, I would want her to know that I am very keen on people having the opportunity to swear an oath of allegiance to her and indeed to the future king of England, currently the Prince of Wales. In that sense, perhaps we have a vested interest in keeping sweet with the monarch.

On the point made by the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell), it is interesting and valid to suggest that the oath be taken in public. Many of us have benefited from the interest that taking the oath generates at the beginning of a parliamentary term. I cannot see why that would not be allowed. I seek the Minister's guidance on whether there is anything to prevent the oath being taken in public. Perhaps an etiquette could be established. Obviously, it is not for us but for the Assembly to decide whether it is a matter of etiquette, but it would be helpful to hear an assurance from the Minister that there is nothing in law to prevent the Assembly from ensuring that the oath be taken in public.

David T.C. Davies: I disagree with amendment No. 20 because I see it as another attempt to undermine the principle that all parliamentarians should swear an oath of allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen. That is very important. With all due respect to the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), it is not about whether we like the Queen or, indeed, whether she likes us; it is about supporting the British constitution, which has served us extremely well since 1688. It is vital that we recognise that it is the monarch who is the head of state. I do not think that that could be more vital at the moment, because we appear to have a Prime Minister who sometimes thinks that he is the head of state. That is another reason why I am pleased to read about the thoughts of the person who I hope will be the next monarch of the United Kingdom.

I support the principle of holding the oath ceremony in public. Perhaps I may be allowed briefly to relate an anecdote about how I happened to become the Father of the House in the Welsh Assembly. A couple of days after I was successfully elected to represent Monmouth, I went out to celebrate with the former Member of Parliament for Clwyd, West, who was elected at the same time as me. Waking up in his house in Cardiff, we decided to go to have a look at the Welsh Assembly before we were officially sworn in 48 hours later. We arrived, whereupon an official said, "Now you are here boys, why don't you come and swear the oath in my private office?" We did so. My colleague subsequently resigned. I then became the Father of the House, being the longest serving Member. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire is laughing. I had the satisfaction, half an hour after taking the oath, of seeing the leader of the Liberal Democrats with his posse of Members arriving with a load of TV cameras thinking that they were going to be the first to take the oath.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now return to the amendment under discussion.

David T.C. Davies: I think that it makes the point that there must surely be better ways of swearing in elected Members of the Welsh Assembly. I suggest that some public ceremony, perhaps taking the form that the ceremony takes when Members of Parliament are sworn in, would be a great improvement. Therefore, I support the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell).

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Amendments Nos. 20 and 21 are an attempt to alter clause 23. They would have the effect of allowing Assembly Members the option of swearing an alternative oath to "serve the people of Wales"

rather than to

"be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty".

The wording of the current oath is the constitutional standard that has been established by the Promissory Oaths Act 1868. It is the same oath that is taken by Members of Parliament and Members of the Scottish Parliament. It is the Government's view that this Bill is not the place to challenge that long-standing convention.

Of course, there is a different position in respect of the Northern Ireland Assembly. Despite the comments of the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies), it has been recognised across the House, including by Conservative Front Benchers recently in the debate on allowances for Members from Sinn Fein, that Northern Ireland constitutes a special position. On that occasion, the Conservative party proposed that an oath of allegiance to the Queen should not be required for

[Kevin Brennan]

Members of Sinn Fein if they wish to take their seats in this House. However, the Government's position is that, in taking seats in the House and in the National Assembly for Wales, albeit acknowledging the special position of the Northern Ireland Assembly, the oath of allegiance should remain.

New clause 5 stipulates that the oath should be taken in public. As well as affecting clause 23, it would impact on clause 55, which deals with Ministers—we now have the separation of Ministers, the Assembly Government and the Assembly itself— taking the oath of office.

In response to the issue raised by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), it is possible for the oath to be taken in public by Members of the National Assembly. In fact, if what I read in the newspapers is anything to go by, it will be extremely difficult for anyone not to take the oath in public in the National Assembly since all the walls are made of glass in the new building, but there is no reason why the oath should not be taken in public. In fact, at the Assembly Committee that considered the Bill on 1 February, there was a discussion of the oath and a similar amendment was moved by the Conservative Member David Melding. He agreed to withdraw that on the basis of the Minister's promise that the matter would be considered when the Assembly's Standing Orders were discussed in the near future. Therefore, there is no reason why Assembly Members could not take the oath in public.

As I have mentioned, clause 55 is a new clause and is consequential on the establishment of the Welsh Assembly Government. Again, it is in line with provisions for UK and Scottish Ministers.

The only change that has been made to the provisions from the Government of Wales Act 1998 is to specify that, under clause 23(2), the person before whom the oath is to be taken is to be specified in Standing Orders, which is properly a matter for the Assembly itself to determine. The approach that has been taken was agreed during the passage of the Government of Wales Bill in 1998 and the Government see no reason to change the decisions that were taken at that time. The ceremony has been in operation for six years in the Assembly, through two Assembly general elections and by-elections, without challenge, but there is the opportunity, during the discussion of the Standing Orders, as I have mentioned, for the Assembly to look at the matter again. I understand that that is what it intends to do. On that basis, I invite the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Llwyd: I am thoroughly unpersuaded but this is perhaps a debate for another day, so I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

ASSEMBLY COMMISSION

Lembit Öpik: I beg to move amendment No. 30, in page 17, line 17, at end insert

'not belonging to the same political group.'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 14, in page 18, line 11, leave out clause 29.

Amendment No. 3, in page 18, line 14, clause 29, leave out subsections (2) to (9) and insert—

'(1A) The standing orders shall include provision for ensuring that in apportioning Members to committees and sub-committees regard is had to the balance of political parties represented in the Assembly.'.

Amendment No. 31, in page 18, line 14, clause 29, leave out subsections (2) to (9) and insert—

'(1A) The members of any committee established by the Assembly under section 28(1)—

(a) shall be elected by the Assembly from among the Assembly members, and

(b) shall, unless that committee exists solely to provide advice, be elected so as to secure that, as far as is practicable, the balance of the parties in the Assembly is reflected in the membership of the committee.

(1B) The committees established by the Assembly under section 28(1) shall be, as far as is practicable, chaired by members of political parties in proportion to the number of members of the Assembly belonging to each party.'.

New clause 8—Composition and chairing of committees—

'(1) The provision included in the standing orders in compliance with section 28(3) must meet the requirements of this section.

(2) The provision must secure that the membership of each committee and sub-committee reflects the balance of political parties represented in the Assembly.

(3) The provision must secure that, taken together, the chairmen of the committees and sub-committees reflect the balance of political parties represented in the Assembly.

(4) The provision must secure that the Presiding Officer decides questions arising under provision made in compliance with this section.'.

Lembit Öpik: This string of amendments is about political balance and how the Assembly Commission will be set up. I look forward to hearing what other Members with amendments in this string have to say in defence of their ideas, but I believe that we have a lot in common in what we are trying to achieve.

Amendment No. 30 would ensure cross-party representation on the Assembly Commission, which will have various responsibilities and functions, such as those relating to "property, rights or liabilities acquired or incurred in relation to matters to which the Assembly would otherwise be entitled".

As far as I can see, nothing in the Bill as drafted guarantees such cross-party representation, so I hope that the Government will accept the amendment, which is fairly uncontroversial. It would simply add to clause 27 the phrase

"not belonging to the same political group".

In other words, we are trying to ensure cross-party representation on the commission, and I hope that the Minister can assure us that the Government will accept the amendment. I really cannot see for the life of me how they could find it controversial.

On the composition of the Committees themselves, we have tabled Amendment No. 31, which would ensure that:

"The members of any committee established by the Assembly under section 28(1) shall be elected by the Assembly from among the Assembly members, and . . . shall, unless that committee exists solely to provide advice, be elected so as to secure that, as far as is practicable, the balance of the parties in the Assembly is reflected in the membership of the committee."

It would also ensure that:

"The committees established by the Assembly under section 28(1) shall be, as far as is practicable, chaired by members of political parties in proportion to the number of members of the Assembly belonging to each party."

As I said earlier, other amendments allude to similar issues, but here we are seeking to ensure a fair balance of representation in the Assembly. When the Assembly was set up some years ago, we were assured that it would constitute a new kind of politics. Well, in order to ensure that, it is also necessary to ensure a cross-party kind of politics. We have spent a lot of time discussing the various proportions within the Assembly and Members' concerns about how Assembly Members are elected. Here is a chance for the Government to be consistent and to show that they really do embrace the concept of democracy that was so lauded in an earlier debate.

If the Government intend to refuse to accept Amendment No. 31, they need to assure us that proper cross-party representation will none the less be genuinely enshrined within the Assembly's structures. I do not want to pre-empt the Minister's comments, but I hope that he will allow me to intervene if he tries to argue that the import of amendment No. 31 is already covered elsewhere in the Bill. I do not believe that it is, and I shall be rather concerned if he neither accepts the amendment nor can actually point to a specific part of the Bill in which its import already exists.

I shall conclude with those few words, while retaining the option to respond to the Minister when he winds up.

David Mundell: I wish to state our broad support for amendment No. 30, which is in the name of the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) and his colleagues. We believe that it makes sense for the membership of the Assembly Commission to reflect the range of parties represented in the Assembly. In speaking to amendments Nos. 14 and 3 and new clause 8, I want also to express sympathy with amendment No. 31, tabled by the Liberal Democrats, which aims to achieve a similar outcome.

Our purpose in proposing to replace clause 29 with new clause 8 is straightforward. Unlike the Government, we want to ensure the greatest possible degree of inclusiveness and sharing of responsibility in the Assembly Committee system. As the Bill makes clear, the Committee system will continue to play a very important role in the Assembly's work by holding the Assembly Government and individual Ministers properly to account. However, under the Bill as drafted, the first place on each Committee will go to members of the largest political grouping in the Assembly, which is currently the Labour party. So as matters stand, in addition to having a Labour Assembly Government, the first place on each Committee will go to a Labour Assembly Member. Likewise, if the Conservative party became the largest party in the Assembly and formed the Government, it would have first place on the Committees. We are not making a partisan point—we believe that that arrangement gives an inbuilt and unfair advantage to one party.

The Committees should be representative of the Assembly as a whole. Instead of the complicated system set out in clause 29, we propose a simple formula that would ensure that, in appointing members to Committees and Sub-Committees, regard be had to the balance of political parties in the Assembly. It is worth noting that part 2 of the Bill contains a series of clauses relating to the Welsh Assembly Government under the heading "'Inclusive' approach to exercise of functions".

We believe that the Committees should operate on the same principle and should be properly inclusive. Indeed, we feel so strongly about this issue that we will press the amendment to a vote, should the Minister not respond to our satisfaction.

Mr. Llwyd: The one-time Member for Llanelli, the right hon. Denzil Davies, was never a fan of things Belgian. Indeed, he was never a fan of things European in general. He once told me over a cup of tea in the Tea Room that he believed that Monsieur d'Hondt himself did not understand the d'Hondt system. What proof he had I am not sure, but I believed him at the time and I rather wonder whether applying the d'Hondt system to the Committee structure of the National Assembly for Wales has any merit whatsoever.

Clause 29 seems to place the Assembly in a unique position in comparison with other devolved UK legislatures. Section 29 of the Northern Ireland Act 1998 prescribes d'Hondt arrangements for Ministers, Committee Chairmen and Deputy Chairmen, but not for Committee membership as a whole; nor do the Standing Orders of the Northern Ireland Assembly require d'Hondt to be used. Strand 1 of the Northern Ireland agreement states:

"There will be a Committee for each of the main executive functions of the Northern Ireland Administration. The Chairs and Deputy Chairs of the Assembly Committees will be allocated proportionally, using the d'Hondt system. Membership of the Committees will be in broad proportion to party strengths in the Assembly to ensure that the opportunity of Committee places is available to all members."

That is the crux of the matter. In my view, it is unacceptable to apply d'Hondt to the selection of Committee Chairs and Vice-Chairs, but it is wrong in principle for it to be applied to the Committee places available to Assembly Members.

6.30 pm

In Scotland, an attempt was made to apply d'Hondt principles to Committee membership at the outset of the Scottish Parliament, but that was abandoned when changes were made to accommodate the minority parties with a single Member. The d'Hondt principles are, however, used in allocating Members' business and selecting Conveners—the Chairs of Committees. The principles are not used to allocate membership of Committees.

[Mr. Llwyd]

I was unable to find any evidence of other parliamentary bodies required to use the d'Hondt formula for selecting Committees by law, or indeed in rules of procedure. Nevertheless, it may be the case that some legislatures have the d'Hondt principles entrenched, but I have not come across them.

West Germany ceased using the d'Hondt method to distribute Committee seats in the Bundestag in 1970. The current Bundestag website states:

"At the beginning of each electoral term, one of the first tasks of the Council of Elders is to reach agreement on the distribution of committee chairs, and deputy chairs, among the parliamentary groups. The number and size of committees, as well as the system used to determine their composition, which is proportional to the relative strengths of the parliamentary groups, are decided ultimately by the Bundestag. As a rule, it bases its decisions on agreements reached among all the parliamentary groups in the House (cross-party agreements).

Until 1970, the relative strengths of the parliamentary groups were calculated using the d'Hondt method, which was also used to calculate the outcome of federal elections until the Bundestag's tenth term (1983). The result, however, tended to favour the larger parties."

One body that does use the d'Hondt formula to select its Committees is the European Parliament, but this is not prescribed by its rules of procedure.

Scottish Standing Orders were drawn up following the recommendations of the Scottish Parliament consultative steering group, which recommended:

"In making recommendations on Committee membership to the Plenary, the Business Committee must have due regard to the balance of parties within the Parliament. Selection of members must not be on the basis of random selection.

The Business Committee, having due regard to the balance of parties within the Parliament, should propose the political party from which a Committee's Convener should be elected. The Committee's members would then elect their Convener subject to that limitation."

Scottish Parliament Standing Orders state:

"1. The membership of each committee shall be decided by the Parliament on a motion of the Parliamentary Bureau.

2. Each committee other than a Private Bill Committee shall have at least 5 but not more than 15 members.

3. A member may indicate to the Parliamentary Bureau his or her interest in serving on a particular committee.

4. In proposing a member to be a committee member, the Parliamentary Bureau shall have regard to the balance of political parties in the Parliament and, where that member has expressed an interest in serving on that committee, to his or her qualifications and experience as indicated by him or her."

However, early in the life of the Parliament, the intention had been to apply the d'Hondt principles. In the debate on the selection of Committee members on 17 June 1999, the then Parliament Minister, Tom McCabe MSP, stated:

"The Parliamentary Bureau asked the four party business managers if they could reach agreement on this potentially difficult issue and they undertook to discuss the matter. In the background of those discussions was the desire that Messrs Harper, Sheridan and Canavan could be accommodated on a committee within the Parliament. Clearly, in determining the size of the committees, we had to strike a balance between the need to manage MSPs' time for their chamber and constituency commitments and the time that they would spend in committee.

We agreed to use the d'Hondt formula for the allocation of committee places. That formula would not provide any places for Messrs Canavan, Harper or Sheridan, but the parties were determined to resist that. In a spirit of fairness, they were determined to find some formula that would allocate a place to each of those three members.

The d'Hondt formula would have allocated six places on an 11-member committee to the Labour party. To Labour's credit, it immediately recognised that, as it does not have a majority in this chamber, it would not be fair for it to have six places."

That is the crucial point.

According to the best evidence that I have been able to garner and the advice that I have taken, even if Labour were narrowly beaten in the National Assembly next summer—as I hope—it would still be in the majority on all the Committees. That cannot be right for a democratic institution and I urge the Minister to look again at the whole matter. If clause 29 goes through, it will bring the whole process into disrepute. We have already heard the word "gerrymandering" this evening, but this is gerrymandering writ large, and it is an unacceptable way to proceed. There is an Independent AM in Cardiff, who would never sit on a Committee. However, it would be even worse if the Labour party were to retain a majority on the Committees without being in power. That would be unacceptable to any parliamentary set-up. I hope that the proposal will be reconsidered as a matter of urgency.

The Minister has been shaking his head from time to time while I have been speaking, but I have models that prove what I have said. A Committee of 10 members would provide the best match for the political balance, but 10-member Committees are not normal in the National Assembly because it would mean AMs having to serve on several Committees, given that there are only 60 AMs. Under the pure d'Hondt formula, single Independent Members would not gain a seat on a Committee until each Committee had more than 50 members.

Two models were considered by the Panel of Chairs in December. Both involved six-member Committees. Further options have been considered, some with eight members and some with 10 members. With eight-member Committees and under the pure d'Hondt formula, Labour would have four members, Plaid Cymru would have two and the Conservatives and Liberal Democrats one each. That does not come close to reflecting the current party balance. It does not give a minimum number of places to reflect current party group membership for Labour or the Conservatives, unless Measure Committees are also included—but the Conservatives would still be under-represented—and there would be no room for Independents. That model, and the same model with an additional Standing Committee, would not come close to the minimum number of places to reflect the current party balance. The Conservatives would still be under-represented and Independents would not be included.

A 10-member Committee would produce five places for Labour, two for Plaid Cymru, two for the Conservatives and one for the Liberal Democrats, which is closer to the current party balance. However, the Conservatives would still be under-represented and other parties would be over-represented. Such a Committee would give the minimum number of places to reflect current party group membership, but it would not include Independents and would mean a far greater work load, because Members would have to serve on at least two, and possibly three, Committees. There are two further models but, to cut things short, I can find no evidence that a d'Hondt system would reflect the true political balance of the Assembly.

As the Minister knows, in earlier debates we tabled an amendment drawn largely from Scottish Standing Orders. In effect, it would have made it incumbent on Committees to reflect political strengths in the Assembly. With respect, I suggest that that is the way to proceed. I cannot understand why we need to consider such a complex procedure, which has been shown to be unfair to several political parties—although, curiously, it is always over-fair to the Labour party except in one model.

I mentioned earlier the danger that the clause will be seen as gerrymandering. It is insidious. I have had private discussions with the Minister about the clause and hope that he will reflect on it, because it has caused outrage across the Assembly and I feel sure that their lordships will take a dim view of it. Much of the Bill is commendable and acceptable and I want it to proceed quickly, but I fear that the clause will be a sticking point in the other place. The Minister said that he had been discussing it with officials over the past three or four weeks. Obviously, I am not privy to discussions between Ministers and civil servants so I do not know how far they have gone. Suffice it to say that if clause 29 is retained, it will be a red rag to a bull in the other place. It will reflect badly on the whole Bill and make its passage far more difficult and—I regret to say—rightly so. I do not like to use the word, but the clause is nothing short of gerrymandering and has no evidence base. If I am wrong, the Minister can explain why.

When the Minister replies, will he tell me what is wrong with the Scottish model, whereby Committees are formed according to the relative strengths in the Parliament, and on which we based our earlier amendments? That would be the best way forward. It would give some slight latitude, but more important it would provide for minority parties as well as for the majority party. Clause 29 is the wrong avenue and if the amendments are pushed to a Division, I shall vote for them.

Mr. Paul Murphy: I want briefly to make two points. First, many people regard the d'Hondt system as extremely fair. We cannot go into mathematical details, but we can consider the precedents. The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) referred to the Northern Ireland example and to strand 1 of the Good Friday agreement, which I chaired, and which set up the Northern Ireland Assembly. Often, when the parties were trying to find the fairest system, they fell back on d'Hondt as the fairest method for appointing Ministers and Chairs of Committees.

As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the system was used in calculating the number of regional list Members of the Welsh Assembly—something we discussed an hour or so ago. It is not a discredited system. He did not say that, but certain people in Wales claim that the system is unfair and discredited. The hon. Gentleman said that it was used to appoint the Chairs of Committees but not for the membership; none the less I am sure that he would be the first to agree that the system as such is not deemed unfair. I spent many weeks discussing it and people came to the conclusion that it was a fair system of allocation.

My second point, which the hon. Gentleman did not mention, is that the Assembly, on a two thirds majority, can decide to adopt a different system. A good aspect of the clause is that it would enable people, if they felt strongly about d'Hondt, to arrive at a system that was acceptable across the political spectrum. Under subsection (8) the clause can be overridden in its entirety by a two-thirds majority of the Assembly. It would provide a stable fall-back provision if the parties in the Assembly were unable to reach agreement on determining political balance.

The Assembly can also determine the size and numbers of Committees; for example, there was an argument for small Committees. The most significant point is that the Assembly itself has the opportunity to decide what method of proportionality it uses for Committee membership. It is better for the Assembly to do that than for a method to be imposed, but if that has to be done the d'Hondt system is a reasonable one.

David T.C. Davies: I have been asked to keep my remarks short, so I shall make only one point.

We spent the first two hours of our debates today listening to the Government maintain that changes to the electoral system had to be made because the current system was too complicated. Indeed, the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) made a fine speech pointing out that members of the public said that the system was too complicated and that nobody understood it, yet the Government want to make a change to the Committee structure of the Welsh Assembly that will clearly be more complicated than the existing system. Not even the right hon. Gentleman could say that it has been called for by any member of the public. In all my years as a Welsh Assembly Member, no one has ever said to me: "Mr. Davies, I think we should change the way Committee members are chosen and move over to the d'Hondt system." I challenge any Member to say that members of the public have said that to them.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman has not been listening, because the right hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) informed us that people in his local pub said, "We want d'Hondt." Instead of just the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) going to Torfaen, perhaps we should all go, to visit the most politicised pub in the country.

David T.C. Davies: With the exception of the right hon. Member for Torfaen's local, not many people seem to be calling for the d'Hondt system to be imposed on the Committee structure of the Welsh Assembly. It certainly does not happen in Monmouthshire.

Mr. Paul Murphy: Of course people would not say that. I entirely agree that d'Hondt is not on the lips of every one of our constituents, but I think they would say that if the Assembly had the chance to work out a system on which all its Members agreed, they would support that. That is the point of the clause.

David T.C. Davies: With respect, I think people would say that any Government organisation that sets a bar of two thirds to change Standing Orders does so to make such a change difficult. The right hon. Gentleman has many years of experience and knows perfectly well that, just as turkeys would not vote for Christmas, the Labour party in the Welsh Assembly will not vote for a system that would make it harder for its Members to have a majority in Committees.

The right hon. Gentleman said that members of the public have talked about winners and losers, but they will say that it is grossly unfair that the Labour party can be in a minority in the Welsh Assembly while its Members are in a majority on all the Assembly's Committees. That is gerrymandering. It is rigging, and not even someone with the right hon. Gentleman's many years in the House could pretend anything else.

Nick Ainger: Obviously, this is a very complex matter and I hope that hon. Members will bear with me while I go through the detail, especially in addressing some of the points made by the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd).

On amendment No. 30, which was moved by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), clause 27 sets up the Assembly commission, thus ensuring that the Assembly has all the property, staff and services that it requires. Amendment No. 30 would insert a requirement that the members of the Assembly commission, other than the Presiding Officer, should not belong to the same political group. The amendment would impose an unnecessary statutory constraint. The Government of Wales Act 1998 has been criticised for placing too many limits on the Assembly, and the Government have made it clear that we intend to give the Assembly as much freedom as possible to make its own decisions about how it will work.

Lembit Öpik: The Government are increasingly schizophrenic. They have introduced some incredibly complicated arrangements, such as the d'Hondt system, while saying that they want to keep things simple. Surely, the Minister must accept that, with something as important as the commission, the Government have a responsibility to ensure statutory cross-party representation. Of all things, the commission should be above party politics.

Nick Ainger: As I move on through my brief, perhaps I can explain to the hon. Gentleman the fact that we are seeking to allow the Assembly to determine how it wants to set up the commission. Bearing in mind all the work that has gone on in the Assembly during the past six years, I would be surprised if the Assembly commission did not reflect the political balance or certainly include members of all parties.

If the Assembly wishes to ensure that the members of the Assembly commission all belong to different political groups, that can be specified in the Standing Orders. There is no reason why a requirement should be included in the Bill to establish that the Assembly must ensure that each political party is represented. As the arrangements in the Scottish Parliament have been cited at length during the debate, it might be of interest to note that the position is the same in Scotland under the Scotland Act 1998—that is, there is no equivalent requirement in that Act to that proposed in the amendment. Such a provision has not been applied in Scotland; nor is there a requirement to make such provision in the Standing Orders.

The other amendments in the group relate to clause 29, which deals with the composition of Assembly Committees using the d'Hondt formula. It would be helpful to hon. Members if they referred to the Bill, because I shall refer to certain subsections of clause 29, which may help hon. Members to understand. In the new Assembly, Committees will play an important role in scrutinising proposed Assembly measures, which the Administration, in the main, will introduce. The express purpose of clause 29 is to provide a stable fall-back for calculating the political balance of the Committees. I emphasise, particularly to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, that this is a fall-back position.

The d'Hondt formula is widely seen as a fair and practical way to apply political balance. It is used across the globe to determine election results and in clauses 8 and 9, as well as in Argentina, Austria, Finland, Japan and Turkey, as the Conservatives have pointed out in their press release, in which they condemn the Labour party for trying to fix the Assembly's Committees. In the same press release, they liken the proposals in the Bill to those of a "banana republic". Are they seriously comparing the Northern Ireland Assembly to a banana republic? As my right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) was explaining, the d'Hondt system has formed an important part of the Good Friday agreement. The formula is also used in the European Parliament to allocate Committee places and has been used in Scotland to appoint Committee Chairs. The Government have not plucked the system out of thin air.

Mr. Llwyd: The Minister stops short. He says that the system has been used in Scotland to appoint Committee Chairs, but he did not go any further, obviously because it does not apply to the membership of Committees. That is the greatest problem that we have, and I was trying to concentrate on that earlier. Is he saying that his colleagues in the Scottish Parliament have done something wrong in some way by saying that they reject the d'Hondt system and that they are looking for a more equitable means to distribute Committee seats?

Nick Ainger: As I go on, I shall certainly quote examples that may be helpful to the hon. Gentleman. The fact is that the d'Hondt system and political balance are exactly the same thing in many cases. I shall quote the example of the size of Committees. Perhaps that will give him some reassurance, although I doubt whether he will agree.

The aim is for political parties in the Assembly to reach agreement on the size and make-up of Committees. That is exactly what has been achieved over the past few months by the Assembly in moving to new, smaller Committees. It has moved from Committees of 10 to Committees of eight. Surely, the intention of all parties—I certainly understand this to be the intention of the present party in government in the Assembly—will be to reach such agreement in the future, but if agreement is not possible, a way forward must be found.

We must recognise that the electoral arrangements discussed earlier today are likely to result in a very close balance between the political groups in the Assembly, as we have seen in the past two Assembly elections. There is nothing partial about the reality that the electoral system will produce very close results. All clause 29 will do is to ensure that, if deadlock were to occur, disagreement about Committee membership should not be allowed to create a stranglehold on the rest of the Bill's provisions. There are important flexibilities in clause 29. In fact, the Assembly will have more flexibility over the number and purpose of Committees as a whole under the Bill than under the 1998 Act.

First, clause 29 will enable parties to reach a consensus. The formula can be overridden by a two-thirds vote in the Assembly. I would expect consensus to be the norm, with agreement reached through the Assembly's equivalent of our usual channels. The d'Hondt arrangements will provide a secure fall-back if agreement cannot be reached. Secondly, clause 29 will ensure that every Assembly Member—whether independent Members or those who belong to smaller parties—is entitled to a place on a Committee, subject to there being enough Committee places to make that possible. I refer the hon. Gentleman to clause 29(9)(a) and (b).

Applying the d'Hondt formula to 10-Member Committees in the current Assembly gives exactly the same allocation of seats among the parties as was adopted by the Assembly when it was operating Committees of that size. I have here a table—I am more than happy to provide the hon. Gentleman with a copy and place one in the Library—that shows the current balance: the Labour party has 48.3 per cent., Plaid Cymru has 20 per cent., the Conservatives have 18.3 per cent., the Liberal Democrats have 10 per cent. and other parties have 3.3 per cent.

Under the d'Hondt system and the present Assembly political balance, four members of a Committee of eight would come from the Labour party, two would come from Plaid Cymru, one from the Conservatives and one from the Liberal Democrats. So the Labour party would have 50 per cent. of the membership. Plaid Cymru would have 25 per cent., compared with its 20 per cent. representation on the Floor of the Assembly, so it would gain. The Conservatives and the Liberal Democrats would have 12.5 per cent., compared with their representation of 18.3 per cent. and 10 per cent. respectively on the Floor of the Assembly.

I cannot see how one could come up with a different political balance. I have to say to the hon. Gentleman that the same is true of Committees of 10. One could not come up with a political balance by agreement that was better than d'Hondt. The idea that the d'Hondt formula is unfair and unreasonable is not borne out by the table, which I am more than happy to share with him.

I accept that in the case of small Committees, such as a Committee of six, there may be a problem. I know that the Opposition have expressed concern about Committees of six, but, frankly, it is virtually impossible, whatever system one uses, to get political balance on such a Committee. If I were a business manager, I would seek an agreement that the Assembly would never have Committees as small as six.

Lembit Öpik: The Minister is giving us the firm impression that he is the full master of the d'Hondt process. To reassure us that he is not simply reading out a brief, will he describe some of the weaknesses of the d'Hondt system that have shown themselves in other countries' systems and say how he would respond to them? That will ensure that he has given us the depth that he implies that he has.

Nick Ainger: Absolutely. The d'Hondt system does not work for Committees with small numbers. In that case, there are distortions. However, Rhodri Morgan, the First Minister, has recognised that. He has put it on the record that, if the Assembly wanted to set up a Committee of six, he would not force through d'Hondt on any Committee that small. If it was felt that a Committee of six was wanted, for whatever purpose, I hope that the usual channels would be able to agree the numbers in the way in which they will in 99 per cent. of cases—hopefully 100 per cent. In most cases, agreement will be reached through the usual channels, recognising the political balance. Again, it is up to the Assembly to determine the size of Committees.

If the Opposition are seeking reassurance about the Labour party's intentions, as I think that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) was, I can put it on record now. Two weeks ago in the Assembly the First Minister said:

> "I am quite happy to place on record the fact that, in the case of any committee for which we thought it advisable to have six committee members, we would not want to see ... d'Hondt ... applied".

I hope that that reassures the hon. Gentleman.

The form of the requirement imposed by new clause 8 would leave the Assembly with very little flexibility, in contrast to clause 29. It would oblige Standing Orders to ensure that each Committee and Sub-Committee reflected party balance. There would be little room to cater for different circumstances, or to vary from a strict application of party balance. There could also be real practical problems in applying the requirement to ensure that, taken together, the Chairs of the Committees and Sub-Committees reflected party balance in the Assembly. Every time a Committee or Sub-Committee started or finished its work, the allocation of Chairs would have to be revisited. I think that hon. Members would accept that that would not be a sensible way to proceed.

The problem with amendments Nos. 3 and 14 is that they do not provide any direction about what should happen in the event that the parties cannot reach consensus. Without the fall-back provision—I emphasise again that it is a fall-back provision—that clause 29 provides, the Assembly could end up with a stalemate, unable to choose between the variety of mechanisms available to define party balance. That is not a hypothetical concern: it is based on experience.

Amendment No. 31 would reinstate the existing provision in the Government of Wales Act 1998 in place of the provisions in clause 29. That would be entirely inappropriate following the separation of the legislature and Executive. The existing requirements in the 1998 Act were designed to deal with the possibility that the Committees might exercise Executive functions of the Assembly. Following separation, such functions will lie with the Welsh Assembly Government and not the Assembly and its Committees. In so far as the provision would have any meaning at all, most Committees, other than, for example, those carrying out detailed consideration of Assembly Measures or Acts after a referendum, would arguably exist "solely to provide advice", in which case there would be no requirement in place at all as to party balance on the vast majority of Assembly Committees.

The provisions of clause 29 are a sensible, impartial and flexible way of ensuring that seats on Committees are allocated to political parties in accordance with their overall representation in the Assembly. As I stated earlier, the d'Hondt formula has not been plucked out of thin air. We have ensured that the interests of small political parties and independents are properly protected and provided the ability for the Assembly to override the formula altogether, which, as I said, I expect to be the norm rather than the exception. In conclusion, for the reasons that I have given, I urge the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire to withdraw the amendment.

Lembit Öpik: I will not withdraw my amendment and I will tell you why, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Quite right.

Lembit Öpik: I thank my hon. Friend for his support. So enraged are the true experts on d'Hondt that they are flowing into the Chamber and on to the Liberal Democrat Benches. The Minister makes fun of me for speaking in such detail about d'Hondt, but I fear that, by contrast, he spoke with very little passion, but from a brief that suggested that he ought to speak up for a system that I suspect fails on the confusion criterion that the Government used only one hour ago to get rid of the split candidature, which they said that the public would not understand.

The Minister dug his own grave in his speech. He said that he wanted to allow the Assembly to come up with Committees as it sees fit and then that he would be extremely surprised if the Committees did not have cross-party representation. I assume from that that his expectation is that the Assembly will see the importance of fair cross-party representation. Further than that, I assume from the tone of his comments that he thinks that there is a moral obligation on the Assembly to ensure proper cross-party representation. Why, then, is he so afraid to enshrine that important moral expectation in the commission's structure in the Bill, rather than simply leaving the matter to fate and hoping that the Assembly decides to have the right format?

The Minister prayed in aid of his argument the fact that no similar provision existed in the Scotland Act 1998. However, in response to a question from, I believe, the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd), who pointed out that Scotland had rejected d'Hondt, the Minister had nothing to say about the fact that he was forcing something different on Wales. In simple terms, the Minister cannot claim that something is right because it is done in one way in Scotland and then ignore the claim that something else is not right because it is done differently in Scotland from Wales. I am afraid that, on that basis, he was entirely implausible. Based on that argument, we have to press amendment No. 30 to a Division. If the Minister thinks about his own argument, far from opposing the amendment, he should show that he is consistent and vote for it, at which point he will have won the undying admiration of all true democrats in the Chamber.

On cross-party representation on the Committees as a whole, I spoke to amendment No. 31.

Amendment No. 3, introduced by the official Opposition, is supported by Plaid Cymru. The principal amendments, Nos. 31 and 33, are the same. However, they are very different from the d'Hondt system for the reasons that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd) so eloquently outlined. It seems that we have the assurance that we do not need amendments Nos. 3 or 31. Rhodri Morgan has assured us that if there are six members of a Committee, he will ensure that the d'Hondt system is not applied.

That is a dramatic revelation on two bases. First of all, Rhodri Morgan has an opinion about something that Westminster is due to decide. Clearly this is much more important to him than the questions put to him about the Iraq war, but we shall pass over that. The second important discovery is that far from the reassurances that we have had that Rhodri Morgan intends one day to retire, it seems that he will go on for ever, simply to ensure that the promise that he has made as an individual—not ex officio—will be sustained in perpetuity. Rhodri Morgan has no jurisdiction to commit his successors to ensure that the d'Hondt system will not apply if there are six or fewer members on a Committee.

In effect, the Minister has given us a promise from his mate that as long as his mate is the First Minister, everything will be all right. That is no way to frame legislation. That cannot be done on the basis of who happens to be in a job at present. I am sure that the Minister knows from his slightly ashen appearance that he has committed a monumental gaffe in suggesting that Rhodri Morgan's word is sufficient to convince the Opposition to fall back from amendments Nos. 3 and 31. There are many holes—

Mr. Llwyd: Is it not the simple fact that, given that the Labour Administration in Cardiff, for their own reasons, want to engineer a deadlock on this issue, which they can, the d'Hondt system has to come in? The mere suggestion then that a two thirds majority—a supramajority—could suddenly overturn d'Hondt is fantasy and nonsense.

Lembit Öpik: It is almost as weak as being offered an assurance from someone who does not have the jurisdiction to make such commitments.

As the hon. Gentleman says, as I have suggested myself and as those on the Opposition Front Bench have pointed out, these arguments have not been advanced plausibly. The Minister falls back on hearsay assurances from individuals who are not qualified to give those assurances. The only hope that these debates would carry water or weight is the assumption that the verbiage of the debates would be the more powerful than the interpretation by any future Administration of the law itself. That is no way to frame legislation. That, by the Government's own admission, will have to carry us through well into the 21st century, when it comes to Welsh devolution.

For that reason, I feel that I have to put amendment No. 32 to the vote. It will be a matter of shame if the Government still feel obliged to oppose such a common-sense proposal. If the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) chooses to press amendment No. 3 to a separate vote, my colleagues and I will have no alternative but to support it.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 179, Noes 269.

EQUALITY OF TREATMENT

Hywel Williams: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 21, line 40, leave out from 'effect,' to 'to' in line 41 and insert

'save in exceptional cases where it is not reasonably possible to do so'.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following: Amendment No. 18, in clause 61 , page 36, line 14, at end insert

', including the implementation of any of the provisions of the Welsh Language Act 1993.'.

Amendment No. 19, in clause 110, page 60, line 35, leave out from 'Welsh' to end of line 37.

New clause 10—Welsh language legislation—

'(1) Sections 106 to 112 and 114 shall come into force on 1st April 2007 in respect of subject 20 in Part 1 of Schedule 7 (the Welsh language).

(2) Section 102 shall not apply to the commencement of subsection (1).'.

Hywel Williams: The amendments and new clause were discussed in Committee, but we believe that further points need to be made.

Amendment No. 17 deals with Assembly proceedings under clause 35, which concerns equality of treatment. The amendment aims to make it clear that treating the Welsh and English languages on the basis of equality is the norm and that any deviation from that practice is exceptional. The Welsh Language Act 1993 states that the Welsh and English languages should be treated on the basis of equality, where it is but it is arguable that that puts the onus on people who want to see material in both Welsh and English to make the case that that is reasonably practicable and appropriate.

"reasonably practicable and appropriate in the circumstances",

Amendment No. 17 turns the tables on that argument. It establishes that bilingualism is the norm in the proceedings of the Assembly, in which case the argument would have to be made why it is exceptional that bilingualism should not apply.

David T.C. Davies: I am surprised, because so far as I am aware, every Assembly publication is bilingual. I have never seen any other kind of Assembly publication—indeed, I question whether it is necessary to translate documents in some cases.

Mr. Llwyd: Not everything is bilingual.

Hywel Williams: I thank my hon. Friend for his sedentary intervention. The argument concerns why things should not be bilingual rather than why they should be bilingual. When the Secretary of State discussed that point in Committee, I gave him examples of circumstances in which it would be exceptional for documents to be produced bilingually. For example, if a document is likely to be superseded within a couple of months, it would clearly waste time and money to translate it, but such circumstances are self-evidently exceptional. I seek a reassurance from the Minister that bilingualism is the norm in the Assembly and its proceedings. The point may appear to be a fine one, but fine points that go missing between cup and lip can cause dissatisfaction.

I want to draw the Minister's attention to a point made by Mr. Hugh Rawlings of the Assembly's constitutional affairs unit. Will the Minister explain the difference between the Government of Wales Act 1998 and the Bill? The 1998 Act states:

"The Assembly shall in the conduct of its business give effect, so far as is both appropriate in the circumstances and reasonably practicable, to the principle that the English and Welsh languages should be treated on the basis of equality."

However, the Bill concerns:

"the conduct of Assembly proceedings".

Will the Minister explain the difference between the two wordings? Mr. Hugh Rawlings has pointed out that the Bill could be construed to be narrower than the 1998 Act. "The conduct of business" is a broad point, whereas "the conduct of proceedings" might be confined to the proceedings of the Assembly itself.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): I hope that the hon. Gentleman sticks to that point. In my ministerial experience, there is a civil servant somewhere who has made that distinction for a good reason, which the House has a right to know.

Hywel Williams: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that intervention. We want to clarify the matter to avoid argument and dissent. Language is an important issue in Wales and tempers get frayed, so it would be useful if that point were clarified.

Amendment No. 18 is straightforward. We merely seek a reassurance that anything that the Assembly Minister does to support the language will include the provisions of the Welsh Language Act 1993. The Secretary of State addressed that point in Committee, but if the Minister were to provide such a reassurance, it would be helpful.

Amendment No. 19 refers to clause 110—there has been a mistake, because it refers to line 28 rather than line 35. Its purpose is to ensure that Bills passed by the Assembly are in both Welsh and English and that there are no circumstances in which a Bill might be passed in Welsh only or in English only. We think it important that the principle of equality applies to the use of both the languages of Wales—English and Welsh—in the Assembly. Again, an assurance would clear up the matter.

New clause 10 is possibly the most contentious provision in the group. It would allow the Assembly to pass a Welsh language measure now as primary legislation without holding a referendum. I accept that that might be contentious, but I hope that the new clause signals to the Minister the importance that we place on that particular issue, because there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in Wales about the operation of the Welsh Language Act 1993.

In Committee, I referred to the great strides taken in 1993 and 1967—in 1967, the then Labour Government passed the Welsh Language Act 1967—but the 1993 Act is 13 years old and the situation has moved on. One would expect any Government to review social legislation in the light of ever-changing circumstances and perhaps to introduce new proposals. The Assembly has given the 1993 Act some attention and introduced its plans, but, as I have said, there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in Wales, because people see that the 1993 Act does not go far enough given the change in the nature of language use in Wales.

Use of the Welsh language is growing, especially among young people. About 30 per cent. of young people speak Welsh, compared with about 20 per cent. of those aged over 65. Welsh is a younger, growing language. Not only that, but the proportion of Welsh speakers who live outside the traditional heartland areas is growing every year. Nowadays, 40 per cent. of Welsh speakers live in the south and east, in areas where the Welsh language is not socially prominent and one cannot assume that one can speak Welsh merely because one is a Welsh speaker. In my own town of Caernarfon, I would not dream of using English in a greengrocer, whereas I would consider doing so in Monmouth or Cardiff.

We need to make much more explicit the absolute right to use Welsh. People should have limited rights for using Welsh in some public services. As regards speech therapy, for example, why should Siôn have a different standard of service from John? John will find it extremely difficult to get speech therapy in English but Siôn will find it impossible, in most places, to get it in the medium of Welsh. There should be parity of treatment and a positive right in respect of that aspect of a public service. I do not think that any of my colleagues, or anyone in Wales, would say that there should be an absolute right for everything to be bilingual—that would not be a practical proposition at present—but that is an example of the dissatisfaction in Wales about the working of the 1993 Act, and why a reasonable Government would review whether the rights could be extended.

Let me explain why some aspects of the 1993 Act support my case for new clause 10. Like many hon. Members, I have recently done a great deal of work on tax credits. That is difficult enough as it is, but, as the Minister will know, Revenue and Customs has found it impossible to generate letters in Welsh with its current computer system, so letters in English are produced, sometimes sensible and sometimes not so sensible. If there were to be a move in language legislation, one would hope that the production of such material in Welsh in Wales would become the norm rather than the exception, so that hon. Members would not waste their time banging the counter at Revenue and Customs and pushing for their constituents to have such material in Welsh.

Last year, I had discussions with the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell), about the forms for licensing. When people were applying for licences before the passage of the Licensing Act 2003, the forms were available only in English. The Minister was very reasonable and said that he would move as quickly as possible to provide them in Welsh. In a written reply to me about two weeks ago, he told me that a working party had met and was discussing the forms, and that that might lead to a statutory instrument some time in the spring, followed by the forms in the summer. That will be one full year after the forms were available in English. I am not trying to ascribe any blame, but that is what happens when the provision of bilingual services in Wales is not the norm, so that almost by default people are denied the right to use the Welsh language.

I will not say much about the variable standards of service from the privatised utilities or the difficulty of getting answers in Welsh from Swansea about the pension system. However, I mention in passing the difficult issue of third parties acting for local or central Government. Private organisations working for local government are supposed to be subject to the provisions in the local authority's language scheme, but that does not often happen. To give a humorous example, during a case in the local Crown court that was conducted in the medium of Welsh, when the order came, "Take him down", everybody in the court moved apart from the two private guards, who had come from Liverpool and had no idea what was going on. That third-party service was not subject to the Welsh language.

As I said, there is a great deal of dissatisfaction. At the very least, I would like the Minister to give some indication that the Government take that seriously and will think about how we can effect, through discussion and agreement, a positive change that would confer to Siôn rights to some limited public services through the medium of Welsh and ensure that third parties are subject to Welsh language schemes. Central Government Departments should be encouraged to see bilingual provision in Wales as normal, so that, for example, the Welsh language could have an explicit statement that it is an official language. In 1993, when Lord Roberts of Conwy was Minister of State at the Welsh Office, he said that the Welsh language is official and has always been so. However, it would be useful to have an explicit statement that Welsh is a legitimate occupational qualification.

Unfortunately, the Governments here and in Cardiff have already said that not a moment of Government time will be available for such legislation. We have in Cardiff a National Assembly for Wales that Labour Members say does not have much to do. In Committee, it was said that there is no problem in staffing committees in Wales because Members are sitting on their hands most of the time. The National Assembly has the interest, expertise and personnel to consider such legislation, so why should not we enable it to do so?

I am a realist and I do not expect the Minister to be immediately persuaded by my words, but some indication that the Government are prepared to take these issues forward would be most acceptable.

Mr. Gummer: I rise to support the thrust of what the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) said, although I am not sure that the amendments are the ideal way in which to achieve his aims.

One of the most heart-warming facts of recent years has been the recovery of the Welsh language from a dying one to a living one. It is crucial for the continuance of the variety of culture in the United Kingdom that the Welsh language be supported. I pay tribute to all those who have made that a success. In many ways, it is probably the most successful attempt at recovering a language. The reason for that lies deep within the Welsh cultural tradition, which is very much a vocal tradition, in singing, in poetry, and in the great works of Welsh art.

It behoves the United Kingdom Parliament to take seriously what is said about the Welsh language because, for our convenience, we have long insisted that English is the only language that is spoken in the Chamber of the House of Commons. That is necessary. We might gain less understanding and knowledge of Welsh concerns if Welsh Members always spoke in Welsh. It would also give the Minister some difficulty, which would be unfair. We therefore need to right that balance by leaning in favour of the language in Wales. It is difficult to understand how the House of Commons can provide enough time for the evolution and the reflection of the growth in importance of Welsh, especially, as the hon. Member for Caernarfon said, among young people and outside its heartland.

When my father learned Welsh, he was thought to be odd. It was not something that a young person did. He did it to be able to sing in Welsh, which one cannot do well without knowing what the songs mean. One can make terrible mistakes and that would have been embarrassing to a clergyman, which my father later became. He liked to know what he was saying or singing. He therefore took an early step in what became a much wider movement.

I have great sympathy with the amendments' intentions, which are to provide that it should be assumed that the two languages are the languages of Wales. I would have been unhappy if the Welsh nationalists had tried to suggest that English was not as much a language of Wales as Welsh. However, we who speak English and not Welsh—learning Welsh was for only one generation; I am English on both sides—must remember that the submerging of the languages of the United Kingdom is a symbol of conquest by the English. We who are English should also remember that the best compliment that we can pay and the best statement about the difference in attitude nowadays that we can make is to ensure that, when languages have survived despite the appalling effort to destroy them, they are encouraged, not least because, unless they are perceived as automatically equal—as the amendments propose—the cultural base that is so important in the Principality will be greatly eroded.

Lembit Öpik: The right hon. Gentleman makes a good point. As he rightly observes, the cultural conquest was largely the attempted extermination of the language. Does he agree that a key goal of the political strategy that we must adopt is to ensure that Welsh has parity of esteem with English, especially in the eyes of younger people? On some occasions, I observe people who feel a little awkward about speaking Welsh because, due to the cultural history that he outlined, it is downgraded in the communities where they live. To that extent, the amendments are in line with achieving parity.

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right. We need to make it clear that the two languages of Wales are equal and, whenever possible, they should be presented as equal. I therefore want to ask the Under-Secretary two questions. First, if he does not support the amendments, does he acknowledge the concern that lies behind them? If so, will he ensure that the language used in future is generous and not mean? I use generous in the sense of ensuring that the emphasis is on ensuring the parity of languages, and not giving an impression that a concession has been squeezed out of any political party. That is why I intervened to support the point of the hon. Member for Caernarfon about the difference between words. The difference in the meaning of the words "business" and "proceedings" may be difficult to imagine, but its existence gives rise to concern, which has a pretty good basis in historical fact. It is therefore important for the Government to be seen to be generous in the matter.

Secondly, I am sure that the Government could ensure the withdrawal of new clause 10 if they would undertake to listen regularly and seriously to proposals for changes in the way in which the language is offered in the Principality that arise from genuine changes in society. If the Welsh Assembly knew that time would be found to give voice to proposals that are made on the basis that Welsh is a living language and that the position changes year by year, I am sure that the extension that the new clause suggests would not be pressed. However, if the Government say that they will do nothing about the matter and that they will not undertake to grant extra time, it would be understandable if the Welsh nationalists felt that the new clause should be pressed, simply because it covers an important issue in the Principality that should be aired in this imperial Parliament. It is a proper matter for the Member of Parliament for Suffolk, Coastal to comment on because it is important to our culture as a whole that we do not lose the culture of a part of the United Kingdom.

If the United Kingdom is to mean anything, we should be as proud of the fact that there is a culture that is special and particular in Wales as I hope the Welsh would be of our culture in the east of England, especially Suffolk. I hope that they would perceive it as important to them, even though the current Government are trying to snuff it out through their regional policy.

David T.C. Davies: I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) that the matter is as relevant in Suffolk as anywhere else. After all, we are considering a language that was called Brythonic and was once the language of Britain before various waves of Angles, Saxons, Danes and Norsemen came to England and pushed it further west. "Cumbria" and "Cymru" are descended from the same word. Hon. Members will guess from that that I have an enthusiasm for the language, which I am told that I have learned to speak with some proficiency.

I am sorry to say that I must stop short of supporting the amendments because I have some concerns about them. I pay tribute to the previous Conservative Government who rightly did so much to protect and preserve the language. It has started to grow even in places such as Monmouthshire. People used to joke that I had doubled the Welsh-speaking population of that county when I learned Welsh, but I assure hon. Members that that is not the case.

Overall, there is a positive attitude to the language, but concerns have been expressed not only by those who want more Welsh, but those who feel that there is too much at the moment. Some people complain about the cost of road signs and of translating every document. I have some sympathy with some points about road signs; the policies could be tailored slightly more to the areas in which they apply, but I would not generally argue with the comments about the positive attitude to the Welsh language. However, if we go too much further and start giving the Assembly powers to legislate without the same amount of scrutiny that applies to all other legislation, is not there a danger that we will begin to turn people against the Welsh language, especially in the anglicised parts of Wales?

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) pointed out that statistics show that 20 per cent. of the population speak Welsh. I am not sure about that. I believe that 20 per cent. have a knowledge of Welsh, but whether one in five could hold a conversation in Welsh is another matter. He underlined the problem when he used the example of speech therapy. There is a huge general shortage of speech therapists in Wales. One cannot legislate for more speech therapists and certainly not for more who conduct their treatment only through the medium of Welsh.

Mr. Llwyd: I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument carefully. One can legislate for more Welsh language speech therapists. For example, one can offer incentives to students to study speech therapy. On almost a monthly basis, I am confronted with the problems of youngsters who need Welsh-speaking speech therapists.

To follow the comments of the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams), the Welsh Language Act was passed in 1993, but since then only nine Departments have adopted Welsh language policies. Last year, wearing my lawyer's hat, I had to advise somebody who had been refused forms to apply for legal aid through the medium of Welsh. Much remains to be done without offending non-Welsh-speaking people. Obviously, their good will needs to be kept, but much work needs to be done.

David T.C. Davies: I would rather look at the bigger picture. There is a danger that we might end up going a bit too far and alienating the many people in Wales who do not speak the language but who have a very good attitude towards it and are prepared to support policies such as compulsory Welsh up to the age of 16 in all state schools, which is something that I have a problem with after key stage 4.

I am not going to go so far as to say that I support the amendments, but I do support the Welsh language. Years ago, my great-grandmother, who came from west Wales, caused shock and horror by saying that she thought that it was important to learn Welsh in order to be able to communicate with the servants—[Laughter.] I am sure that I am going to regret sharing that. However, if we were to go to some parts of Cardiff nowadays—particularly the Pontcanna area, which is inhabited by quangocrats—we would probably find that it was the other way round, and that people would have to learn English in order to talk to the domestic servants. I shall finish by reminding people of the Welsh phrase, "Gan bwyll mynd yn bell", which roughly translates as "Go a little bit more slowly and you'll get a lot further in the long run."

Nick Ainger: This has been a good debate, and the fact that it is now 8.11 pm and we have all this time to debate this issue proves what an excellent programme motion we tabled. Most of the issues were discussed in Committee, and I know that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) is seeking some reassurance on them. I hope that I shall be able to help him. The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) also made some points on the amendments, and I hope to be able to reassure him as well.

Amendment No. 17 would alter the obligation on the Assembly to treat English and Welsh equally in the conduct of its proceedings so that, rather than using the formulation in the Government of Wales Act 1998 that everyone accepts has worked well, the Assembly would have to do so

"save in exceptional cases where it is not reasonably possible to do so".

The Bill provides minimum legal requirements with which the Assembly must comply. The new legislature should have some limited discretion to decide on its own procedures in this respect, which is what clause 35 proposes. We are not in a position now to say what will not be "reasonably possible" in relation to treating the Welsh and English languages on a basis of equality, but that is what the amendment suggests, by including the condition relating to "exceptional cases". The hon. Member for Caernarfon tried to come up with an example of an exceptional case, and he suggested that a document that was about to be superseded by a new one would present just such a case. However, that would not be exceptional at all; it happens quite regularly. It is actually quite difficult to provide examples of cases that would be considered exceptional.

It has been suggested that the amendment would enhance moves towards full equality of the two languages in the Assembly, but good and continuing progress is already being made under the existing provision. Last year, for example, the Assembly began producing part-bilingual verbatim transcripts of its Committee proceedings on a routine basis. The amendment is therefore unnecessary.

The hon. Gentleman sought reassurance that issues relating to the Welsh language would be taken forward, and that there was a commitment to bilingualism in the Assembly. I can give him that assurance. Clause 61 already gives Welsh Ministers the power to do anything that they consider "appropriate" to support the Welsh language. Together with the Welsh Ministers' functions under the Welsh Language Act 1993, this provides a broad basis for promoting the Welsh language.

The hon. Gentleman spoke at some length to new clause 10. We believe that the new clause is unnecessary because legislative competence for the Assembly on matters relating to the Welsh language could be sought under the Order in Council process in part 3 of the Bill. Immediately after the part 3 powers come into effect, following Royal Assent, in May 2007, it will be possible for an Assembly Minister or a Committee of the Assembly to ask for powers relating to the Welsh language to address any of the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised, including those relating to speech therapists.

Hywel Williams: Will the Minister confirm that that relates only to devolved matters, and that some Welsh language matters are retained here at Westminster?

Nick Ainger: I believe that the only retained function relates to the use of Welsh in courts; that is virtually all that is left. I accept that there might be problems in regard to a particular Government Department producing bilingual forms, and we are all aware of what happened with the Licensing Act 2003. Clearly, such problems need to be addressed, but they can be addressed directly by an Assembly Minister making representations to his counterpart here in London. Many of the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised will be able to be addressed immediately after May 2007, through the part 3 procedures. One of my concerns about new clause 10 is that it would provide a move towards giving primary powers without a referendum, whereas everywhere else in the Bill, such a move requires a referendum.

Mr. Gummer: I have great sympathy with that argument, but does the Minister accept that the fact that it took a year for the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to produce a Welsh form, when it ought to have been automatic—it really should never have got to that stage—undermines the confidence of the House in the ability of Ministers here and in the Welsh Assembly to get the simple things done? It would be helpful if he could promise that these things will not happen in future, and that such documents will be produced automatically.

Nick Ainger: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman about the production of the licensing forms. I believe that the Department responsible has apologised for not getting that right when it would not have been too difficult to get it right. The powers to address such issues are in part 3 of the Bill. We want a streamlined system because, as the right hon. Gentleman said, it can often take too long to sort these problems out. The Order-in-Council procedure will enable the Assembly to take powers in regard to any Welsh language responsibilities that it wants to change or enhance. Use of the part 3 procedures will get rid of the logjam that we now face whenever we want to make significant changes to the Welsh Language Act 1993.

Mr. Llwyd: I want to underline the point made by the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer). My hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) and I met the Minister to talk about the Welsh language forms required under the Licensing Act 2003, and we warned him in the kindest and most respectful way about the issue six months before the cut-off date. That was in the November, but the problem carried on for almost a year. That is not good enough. Had the competence for these matters been in Cardiff, they would have been able to move a darned sight more quickly.

Nick Ainger: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right. As I said, I think that the Department has apologised for that. For the production of something that was not particularly difficult, the process was far too long.

I want to reassure the House, and particularly the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal, about the commitment of the Welsh Assembly Government, and this Government, to the language. Perhaps I can draw his attention to the report produced by the Welsh Assembly Government on Iaith Pawb, its policy to promote Wales as a bilingual country. It builds Welsh language considerations into all policy developments. There is lots of evidence that, certainly since the Assembly's inception, the language is taking its place in the hearts of the Welsh people and in the administration of government at all levels in Wales. We have made significant strides and continue to do so.

I hope that I have been able to give the hon. Member for Caernarfon the reassurances that he was seeking.

Hywel Williams: It would be useful if the Minister could respond to my point about "proceedings" and "business".

Nick Ainger: I am glad that the name of Hugh Rawlings has featured in our debates, because he has been an important member of the Bill team. That team has worked hard over many months to get to where we are today. I want to put on the record my gratitude to Mr. Rawlings and all the other members of the Bill team for their excellent work in supporting me and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

The reason why we changed from "business" to "proceedings" is that "business" was used to cover the existing Assembly when it was acting as both a legislature and an Executive. The change reflects the separation. When the Assembly acts as a legislature, the term "proceedings" will be used, as in Parliament and the Scottish Parliament. "Business" will now equal "proceedings" plus the Executive functions. I hope that that explains the change, which is basically due to the separation of the Executive from the legislature. We will now use the same sort of terms as we use here.

Mr. Gummer: Will the Minister assure the House that nothing that the word "business" would have comprehended will be left out because of the use of the word "proceedings"? Does "proceedings" cover everything that was covered by "business"?

Nick Ainger: Yes.

Having reassured the hon. Member for Caernarfon, I hope that he will now withdraw the amendment, so that some of us can have something to eat tonight.

Hywel Williams: I am happy to withdraw the amendment. This has been a positive debate, and I thank Members who have contributed and the Minister for his response. These issues will not go away, and my colleagues in the Assembly will be looking to use the part 3 powers as early as possible to address the language issues there. I still have concerns about the matters retained here, and we will return to those issues in future. In the meantime, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Further consideration adjourned.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

Bill to be further considered tomorrow.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On a major constitutional Bill, which the Secretary of State said would define the Government of Wales for a generation, it cannot be satisfactory that so much time for debate is lost, even giving regard to the Minister's need to eat. If the programme motion had allowed us to move on to the next set of amendments, pressure that might be exerted on tomorrow's business would automatically have been relieved. Large parts of a major constitutional Bill will now go unscrutinised.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is an additional point. People outside will feel that we have had too much time and have not been able to fill it. The real problem, however, is that the way in which it has been apportioned means that we have had too little time in certain areas and too much in others. Dealing with that would be a great help.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am shocked. We cannot win on this matter. We give sufficient time for proper scrutiny, but when the Opposition do not take up that time, we are criticised for giving too much time. It is up to the Opposition to table amendments and scrutinise the Bill. We have given them sufficient time to do it, and they have decided not to take up that time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I sense that I have been a little generous in listening to those points of order, because it was starting to become a debate. The Chair can only point to the fact that the House passed a programme motion earlier, and we are governed by that motion, which could only have been effected by negotiations with the usual channels beforehand. The motion that we had was approved, however, and that is what controls proceedings.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Ordered,

That Mr. Tim Yeo be discharged from the Culture, Media and Sport Committee and Philip Davies be added—[Rosemary McKenna, on behalf of the Committee of Selection.]

PETITIONS

Bus Services

8.27 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): For many, public transport is not an optional extra but essential. Hon. Members on both sides of the House know how difficult and damaging it is when a bus service is cut, especially for vulnerable, older and disabled people who rely on it. This petition was compiled by Mr. Howard Norton, a worthy campaigner, and it comprises around 500 signatures. I congratulate and thank everyone who signed it and sincerely hope that it will be successful.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons.

The Petition of the residents of Castle Point and others,

Declares that the Petitioners wish to formally record their objections to the removal of the No. 12 bus service from Pitsea to Benfleet by First Essex Buses Limited because there is no alternative service and the removal will cause great inconvenience and hardship to those residents who rely solely on public transport and that this loss is unacceptable and particularly hurts vulnerable people in our community.

[Bob Spink]

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to accept the views of local people and find a way to encourage the Bus Company to maintain the No. 12 service.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Pedestrian Crossing (Furtherwick Road)

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): There is a new political and public acceptance that road safety for all, particularly older people and children, must come before motorists' convenience, especially around schools and shopping areas and where there are fast roads to be crossed. I am delighted to present a petition with about 1,000 signatures, which was organised by Mrs. Margaret Finch, a lady who cares about people and about her community. It was signed by many people, to whom I pay tribute and give sincere thanks.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons,

The Petition of residents of Canvey Island and others,

Declares that the petitioners are deeply concerned about road safety around the parade of shops at the seafront end of Furtherwick Road. And further declares that the petitioners are aware of the relatively high speed of traffic and a number of near misses and great danger, especially for elderly people and children and notes that there are no reasonably accessible means of crossing the road at this point.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to impress upon Castle Point borough council and the Highway Authority the importance of serving local people by providing a pedestrian crossing to improve road safety, particularly for children and elderly people on this stretch of road.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Civil Service Widows (Pensions)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Alan Campbell.]

8.30 pm

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): The circumstances of tonight's debate, and the timing thereof, remind me of another happy occasion some years ago, in the early 1990s, when I was fortunate enough to secure an Adjournment debate on opencast mining. On that occasion, too, the House's business had finished rather earlier than expected. I am pleased to report that we did a thorough and proper job of scrutinising the issue and that the Minister rose to reply at the appropriate time of 10.15 pm. I am sure that the thought is now crossing the Minister's mind that there is a way for him to prevent a similar fate from befalling him tonight. He need only intervene on me at any point to satisfy my requests to be assured of an early night so that he can get on with revising for his intensive Committee work tomorrow.

This is a serious matter, which affects thousands of people in our country today. It involves the pension arrangements for civil service widows and widowers under the co-called classic pension scheme which operated before the introduction of the premium pension scheme in October 2002. Under the classic scheme, if surviving spouses of civil servants remarried or decided to cohabit, they would automatically lose all rights to a civil service pension. At least, that would happen unless their new relationship also unfortunately ended as well, in which event I understand the pension could be reactivated. The current arrangement, the so-called premium scheme, allows for a pension for life. Widows or widowers of civil servants who remarry or cohabit in future will not lose their civil service pensions. The fundamental problem for which I seek redress is that someone can be married to a civil servant, go through life with that husband or wife, lose that person, be entitled to a widow's or widower's pension, but—if owing to changed circumstances he or she decides to remarry or cohabit—lose the pension at some future date.

A number of principles are involved. The situation, which is of serious concern to many widows and widowers, was drawn to my attention not by a civil service widow but by one of my constituents, Mrs. Gillan Cooper, who happened to be the widow of a police officer. She wrote to me at the time. When people go through life with a partner, whether they are married or not, they live their lives together, but often also live their jobs together. By the very nature of a partnership, they experience all the travails, worries and difficulties that people encounter in their daily work. That is shared with a partner; it is something that partners go through.

At the end of the relationship, when a partner dies, it is impossible to wipe out at any stage in the future the fact of the marriage or partnership—the fact that the two lived their lives together and were involved in a job together. One person may have undertaken the job—whether as a civil servant, a police officer or a member of the armed forces—but the other had lived with that person as a partner and had experienced all the concerns and heartaches of job as well. They supported their partner in their activities and their work, and are thus entitled to a pension as a widow or a widower. When someone who has lived with their partner for a long time and who has experienced their job is widowed, they are entitled to a pension. There is something fundamentally wrong if, as a result of the act of remarrying or cohabiting, all that history, everything that they have been through and their entitlement to a pension, is suddenly removed at a stroke by the enforcement of a pension regulation. That is very unfair indeed.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate. We have taken a number of measures over the years against discrimination, but does my hon. Friend agree that the operative word for this pension provision is "discriminatory"? A married couple—in this case, a civil servant and his wife—may be married for a long time, and the wife ultimately expects a share of his pension because of the hardship, which takes various forms, that she experiences as a widow. Surely, the measure is discriminatory, especially as only about 10 per cent. of women are entitled to a pension.

Mr. Betts: My hon. Friend makes a very good point indeed. It is a matter of entitlement. The spouse of a civil servant, a police officer or an officer in the armed forces effectively achieves entitlement to a pension when they are widowed. The removal of that entitlement at any stage is a fundamental injustice that goes against the grain of the British sense of fairness.

The regulations say that the pension will be taken away if the individual remarries or cohabits. It is quite simple to prove that someone has remarried. Indeed, because everyone knows that it is possible to discover whether someone has remarried, people will write a letter to officials saying, "Hands up, I know that I will lose my pension, but I wish to inform you that I have remarried." Although they do not like it and disagree with it profoundly, they accept that the pension that they receive as a widow or a widower will come to an end. Does my hon. Friend the Minister believe that that happens in all cases of cohabitation? How do the Government know whether someone is cohabiting? Does the Duchy of Lancaster employ an army of individuals who go round the country late at night or in the early hours of the morning to discover whether the widow or widower of a civil servant, a police officer or an Army officer is cohabiting? Do they go out once or twice in the middle of the night to discover whether they are cohabiting? Unless someone puts up their hand and says that they are cohabiting, there is not the faintest possibility that the Minister or his civil servants will know whether someone is cohabiting and should not claim a pension.

Individuals may do something to alert the authorities dealing with pension payments to the fact that they are cohabiting. For example, a widow and a widower who both receive civil service pensions may start to cohabit and provide the officials administering the pension scheme with the same address. Under those circumstances, the officials might put two and two together and work out that the couple are cohabiting. Alternatively, anonymous phone calls might be made, and officials could respond to them. The reality of the situation, however, is that if a widow or a widower remarries they will lose their pension, but if a widow or a widower cohabits they probably will not do so—so the Government are effectively discriminating against people who remarry.

I do not believe that the state should give people financial incentives to marry. The Government have been right in saying that it is not their responsibility to interfere in people's relationships and say that people should or should no, marry. If people want to live together outside marriage, that is fine. Equally, the state should not give people incentives to co-habit rather than to marry. However, that effectively is what it is doing. One can prove marriage very easily—to prove that someone is co-habiting is much more difficult.

I do not know what the cost of the proposal to bring back the pension for all those who have lost it in this way would be. I have seen a number of figures. I have heard that a one-off payment of £3 billion would have to be made. I find that a little difficult to get my head around. It must extend beyond civil servants to all public servants in this situation. It must assume that people in these circumstances will be paid the pension that they lost over the years after they remarried or cohabited.

I accept that that would be a substantial sum of money and perhaps another thing that the Civil Service Pensioners Alliance would not press for, but I see many different figures for providing a pension from now on to the people who have lost it, or for in future not taking away the pension of people who remarry or cohabit. The Civil Service Pensioners Alliance has given me the figure of £300 million over 30 years. According to its estimate, that would add 0.4 per cent. to the current pension cost. If a further demand for a pension for post-retirement marriage widows and widowers were accepted—I understand that widows are not entitled to benefits if they retired before 1978 and widowers if they retired before 1988—that would add another £75 million over 20 years, or about 0.14 per cent. to the cost. Therefore, about 0.5 per cent. in total could be added for both proposals. It does not seem an awful lot of money.

When I asked questions of the then Minister of State, Cabinet Office, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Ruth Kelly), in October 2004, I was told that in the previous two years only 325 widows or widowers' pensions were suspended due to remarriage or cohabitation, and that to reinstate all the pensions that were suspended over the previous 10 years would cost about £50 million. It does not seem that we are talking about enormous sums of money.

Is there not something fundamentally wrong with a system that says to someone, "If you are going to go into a new relationship, we are going to financially penalise you for that. We are going to make you choose whether to go into that relationship without any income of your own and to rely on your new partner absolutely, or whether to accept that you cannot go into a new relationship because the financial penalty imposed on you is so great that it is not worth while"? Forcing people into that dilemma—the choice between the pension that they were entitled to because of their previous spouse's employment and having a new relationship—is fundamentally wrong. The state is interfering in matters, albeit not by design but by effect, in which it should not be involved. It should not be putting people in the position of having to make that appallingly difficult choice.

[Mr. Betts]

My final point must have crossed the Minister's mind. He must have got copious briefing from his civil servants about it because it is about equal opportunities. As my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham) said, the Government have to address that issue seriously. We have a very good record on equal opportunities across the board on a series of matters.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: My hon. Friend raises an important point, which I touched on earlier. The Government have a very good record on equal opportunities, but a report will be published tomorrow or the day after on equal pay for women. It seems that what he has described affects not only men but women. It could be seen as a sanction. If we think about it, the two things are linked. Nine times out of 10, it will be the woman who will face the sanction and be forced into a situation where, as he said, she does not declare the fact that she is cohabiting. Perhaps she will just decide not to have a relationship. At the end of the day, she made a major contribution through bringing up a family for 30 or 40 years. Does he agree that things have to be looked at in a broader sense?

Mr. Betts: I agree entirely and my hon. Friend makes a very important point. Indeed, today's report deals with the inequality between women's pay and men's pay, and the Government have rightly expressed concern about that issue and spoken of the need to address it. Of course, pay is not something that they can directly influence in every circumstance, but they can directly influence pensions because it is within their remit to do so.

The Government recently dealt with the equal opportunities problems to which the 85-year rule for the local government pension scheme has given rise. In general, women do not serve in local government for quite as long as men because their service is often broken, so they cannot benefit from the 85-year rule to the same extent. The Government have therefore said that because the rule disadvantages women, it is fundamentally unfair and must be removed. However, here we are talking about a rule for civil service widows and widowers that by its very nature discriminates against women, because the fact is that the vast majority of those who lose their pension in this way are women. The Minister doubtless has the precise figures, but we know that to be the case. This rule significantly disadvantages women because more widows lose this pension entitlement than do widowers.

I suspect that if the Government applied to the rule for widows' and widowers' civil service pensions—and elsewhere in the public sector—the same test that they applied to the 85-year rule for the local government pension scheme, they would objectively conclude that the former rule is equally discriminatory. I urge the Government to re-examine it because it is fundamentally unfair. It is unfair because it removes a right that a person has built up over time by being married to someone who was in a job that, in a sense, the couple shared during their lives together. That entitlement should not be removed. It is unfair because it requires people to choose between keeping their financial entitlement and entering into a new relationship. It is unfair because it discriminates between those who remarry and those who cohabit. Ultimately, it is unfair because it discriminates against women in a way that could be subject to challenge in the courts under equal opportunities legislation. It would be much better if the Government accepted responsibility and removed this rule, rather than leaving it to the courts to do so.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Jim Murphy): I begin by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) on securing a debate on this important subject. In my time in Parliament, I, like others, have come to know him as a diligent worker on his constituents' behalf; this is but the latest example of that work. Indeed, he mentioned—in a modest fashion—the work that he has done on behalf of Mrs. Cooper, his constituent, in the past two years or more. I was also pleased that we had a chance to hear from my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South (Mr. Cunningham), who, equally, continues to raise such issues on his constituents' behalf when he feels that they are not getting a fair deal under the current regulations. Indeed, he has a reputation throughout the House for standing up for his constituents and the industry in his constituency. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe has allowed me almost an hour and three quarters to sum up; that is very kind of him. I am sure that he will understand if I do not take the full time allocated to me.

Before dealing with the specific matters raised by my hon. Friend, I want to stress, as I have done before, that the Government are committed to enabling all our pensioners to share in the country's rising prosperity. We have introduced a variety of measures since 1997 to achieve that aim and I will touch on them later. The Government have, of course, recently reached an agreement with the public service unions that aims to put public service pension schemes on a more sustainable footing. We have agreed that pensions for existing staff will continue to be calculated under the current rules and we are negotiating with the unions on the form of the scheme for new entrants. But we have made it clear that the costs of the civil service pension provisions as a whole must be contained within an agreed cost envelope. That is intended to deliver savings of £2.1 billion to the taxpayer over 50 years. So any improvements in one area of pension provision must be funded by further savings from elsewhere.

Turning now to the substance of the debate and the specific points that my hon. Friend raised, I want to outline how the rules for the payment of pensions to spouses of members of the civil service pension scheme have evolved over the years. In the past, as now, the Government have sought to provide their staff with pension arrangements consistent with those of other good employers. While some of the historical provisions may seem very restrictive now, at the time they would have been seen as unremarkable or, indeed, as relatively generous.

Widows' pensions have featured in civil service pension arrangements since 1949. At that time, there was no legal requirement for an employer to provide any benefits whatever to its employees' widows. The Superannuation Act 1949 introduced widows' pensions provided that the marriage took place during the civil servant's period of service. That was seen as consistent with the role of a good employer at that time.

Attitudes and social legislation have developed. Since April 1978, as my hon. Friend mentioned, pension schemes that contracted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme have to pay a widow's pension whenever a contributor dies and leaves a widow, irrespective of the date of the marriage. The civil service scheme was changed, but only in relation to service from 6 April 1978. Only service from that date counted for a widow's pension where a member married after leaving civil service employment.

The situation for women was slightly different. Female civil servants were not required to pay contributions for a widower's pension until July 1987. That change anticipated the requirement from April 1988 for contracted-out schemes to pay a widower's pension, irrespective of the date of the marriage. Again that was not applied retrospectively and only service from April 1988 counts for a widower's pension where the marriage has taken place after the woman left civil service employment.

The intention behind the payment of pensions to widows and widowers was to provide some measure of financial compensation for the loss of financial support that the beneficiary had received from their late husband or wife. So, if the beneficiary remarried or cohabited, the expectation was that they would look to their new spouse or partner for financial support. The UK state scheme has similar provisions. It was on that basis that the civil service pension scheme was costed and member contribution levels set. Some 127,000 widows' and widowers' pensions are currently payable under those provisions. My hon. Friend mentioned some specific facts and figures, but it is my understanding that some 150 to 200 pensions a year are stopped because the widow or widower no longer meets the conditions for payment.

My hon. Friend asked specific questions about how the Government track eligibility for payment of widows' and widowers' pensions. In the past, widows and widowers were sent an annual statement of entitlement to complete. If the individual did not respond after two reminders, the pension was stopped. However, some 20 years ago, the Treasury, which was then responsible for civil service pensions, decided to abandon the annual statement of entitlement exercise. Since then, all pensioners receive an annual letter from the payroll authority, which includes a reminder to all recipients of a widow's or widower's pension that they must notify Capita—the payroll authority—if they have remarried or begun cohabiting. As my hon. Friend suggested, notification may come from a third party, at which point the certificate of entitlement is sent directly to the person receiving the pension. In practice, some relationships may end prematurely. The civil service pension scheme rules allow the restoration of widows' and widowers' pensions if a new marriage or relationship ends.

As I said, some of the provisions may appear out of date. When we introduced a new civil service pension scheme in October 2002, the deal agreed with the unions was that the entire cost of the scheme improvements would be met by members paying higher contributions. The new scheme, which as my hon. Friend rightly said is called the premium scheme, provides higher pensions for members and improved provisions for dependants, but members of the premium scheme pay contributions of 2 per cent. more than those in the former scheme, now called the classic scheme. The difference is that contributions are 3.5 per cent. compared with 1.5 per cent, which, for the average civil servant in the premium scheme, means extra contributions of about £300 a year after tax.

Although the new scheme was intended for new entrants, it is important to note that we gave civil servants in service when the new scheme was introduced the option to transfer to the premium scheme, if they were prepared to pay the higher contributions. Those who chose to transfer all their service across also agreed that it would be reduced to reflect the improved, and more costly, benefits.

Inevitably, comparisons have been drawn between the more generous provisions of premium and the benefits paid under classic, which apply both to those who left the civil service before October 2002 and to the majority of serving civil servants who opted to stay put rather than transferring to premium. My hon. Friend understandably made that comparison this evening.

It is true that premium is more generous in certain aspects of the benefits available to widows and widowers of members. It provides a pension based on the member's entire service, even if the marriage began after the member left service. It also provides for a pension for life for a widow or widower, even if she or he remarries or cohabits, and pensions for unmarried partners.

Many other improvements have been made to public service pensions over the years, which, it has been argued, should be applied retrospectively. They all have clear benefits for members so it would be difficult to implement some and not others.

Mr. Betts: Did my hon. Friend say that notification by an individual or a third party is the only way that the rules can be enforced and that the Government do not have a proactive policy for finding people who may be in breach of the rules? Can he give a breakdown of the number of people whose pensions have been taken away due to their remarriage or cohabitation?

Mr. Murphy: I will be happy to provide the information that we have on those points. My hon. Friend's interpretation of what I said earlier is right. Previously—about two decades ago—the Treasury actively sought confirmation from recipients that their marital or cohabitation status had not changed, but it was faced with the challenge of responding to about 100,000 requests for information. The decision was taken, under the previous Government, not to continue with that process. My hon. Friend is right to conclude that the current process relies on recipients notifying the authorities of their changed status. He can of course try to reverse the position if he wants to do so. If there is additional information about the tracking procedure that I feel it necessary to provide, I will write to him.

The costs of retrospectively improving benefits above those originally promised to members are substantial. I cannot verify the figures cited by my hon. Friend, but the scheme actuary estimates that if the civil service scheme were to pay widows, and widowers, pensions for life, rather than stopping them on remarriage or cohabitation, we would face a one-off cost of about £300 million, plus an ongoing cost in respect of current members of about 0.1 per cent. of pay, which would be £15 million for the civil service scheme, but £150 million annually across the public services.

If the Government were to agree to a taxpayer-funded improvement in civil service widow and widower pension benefits, it would inevitably lead to pressure to provide similar improvements for other public service employees. My hon. Friend was generous enough to acknowledge that, if such a principle were included in the civil service scheme, there would be pressure to apply it across the public sector. For the whole public service, the Government Actuary's Department estimates the one-off cost at about £3 billion. Of course, in both cases there would also be a year-on-year cost to cover the build-up of further liabilities.

Mr. Betts: I am trying to get the figures correct. The figure of £3 billion is in the public domain, but most people scratch their heads and wonder how it is calculated. Does it include the cost of paying back the pensions to which people would have been entitled if the rule had not existed in the first place? It is difficult to understand how there can be a one-off cost if all that happens is that people's entitlement is restored from now on.

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend identified in his opening remarks some of his own estimates from a retired civil servants' organisation, and rather than discussing the methodology this evening, I undertake to share with him some of the analysis of how the Government Actuary arrived at those figures. I hope that he will find that the most appropriate way to deal with the issue.

Of course, the Government recognise the strength of feeling on this issue, and the issues on which the Civil Servants Pensioners Alliance, which my hon. Friend mentioned, are campaigning will be considered during negotiations with civil service unions on the wider public service pensions reform agenda. There is a commitment to discuss these matters with the civil service unions, as part of the wider reform of civil service pensions; but of course, as before, any change must be met from within the existing cost envelope.

On support for pensioners more generally—of course, including those who are former civil servants—the Government have listened to pensioners and taken numerous initiatives to address their concerns. Reforms to state pensions and other measures introduced since 1997 have helped virtually all pensioners and targeted substantial resources on those most in need. The Government are setting up a £300 million fund over the next three years to provide pension credit recipients with free central heating, and providing discounts of £300 on central heating systems for pensioners who do not have them. Of course, we are continuing with the winter fuel payment, which is popular among hon. Members on both sides of the House and in all constituencies. I understand that there are about 18,500 recipients of the winter fuel payment in my hon. Friend's constituency.

We are also spending about £10 billion extra in real terms on pensioners, following the introduction of pension credit: £7 billon more in 2005–06 than if the basic state pension had been linked to earnings since 1998. Pension credit was in payment to an estimated 6,300 claimants in my hon. Friend's constituency towards the latter part of last year. From April 2006, people aged over 60 and disabled people will be entitled to free off-peak local area bus travel in England, with separate arrangements already in place for Scotland. That will benefit up to 7 million over-60s.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: We all appreciate the tremendous efforts that the Government have made with issues such as pensioner poverty and pensions in general, but will my hon. Friend clarify something that he said earlier? Some spouses are unable to claim civil service pensions because they get married again. He knows that, very often in trade union negotiations, 1 per cent. might be traded off a wage increase to get something else, perhaps relating to pensions. Will such things be part of wage negotiations, or will there simply be a general discussion with the trade unions?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend was a trade union official, so he talks from experience. I have no idea whether the processes have changed since he was at the height of his powers as a union negotiator, but I am happy to confirm to the House that we are content to discuss the pension entitlement of widows and widowers in the event of remarriage or cohabitation with the relevant trade unions as part of negotiations on the wider reform of civil service pensions. The matter is an aspect of pensions negotiations, rather than wage negotiations. However, before my hon. Friend takes too much heart from that statement, I reiterate that negotiations on civil service pensions must progress with regard to the existing cost envelope.

Mr. Cunningham: I thought that the Minister was going to say that. He made a key point when he said that there was a ceiling on the amount of money that could be spent. As he and I know, one does trade-offs in such a situation. I asked the question in the first place for clarification on whether the matter was being considered as part of wage negotiations, or as a separate issue relating to civil service pensions, and I think that he has answered me.

Mr. Murphy: We cannot hold such negotiations on the Floor of the House, although I sometimes think that if one wants to keep a secret, this is perhaps the best place to say something. If civil service unions feel strongly about the matter and wish to enter into dialogue with us, we are happy to hold a discussion, albeit on the premise that we keep to the existing spend and cost envelope.

Let me draw my remarks to a conclusion, albeit earlier than I promised. In 2006–07, as a result of the Government's measures, pensioner households will be on average £26 a week better off than they were under the 1997 system. The poorest 10 per cent. of pensioners in our constituencies will be £42 a week better off. Regardless of the outcome of the negotiations on pension reform, civil service pensioners and their dependents will benefit from the measures that I have outlined.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe for giving the House the opportunity to have this debate. He raised what he rightly called an important issue and brought a technical debate to life with his passionate contribution. I also thank my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South for taking an interest in the debate and participating in it, and hope that I have explained the Government's position effectively.

The Secretary of State was asked—

Members' Voting Rights

1. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with ministerial colleagues on the voting rights of hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies in relation to matters that affect only England. [54018]

2. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): What discussions he has had with Cabinet colleagues on the voting rights of hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies on matters not affecting Scotland. [54019]

3. Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with ministerial colleagues regarding voting rights of hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies on matters not affecting Scotland. [54020]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I express the good wishes of the whole House to Mr. Speaker? We look forward to seeing him back as soon as possible and hope that he makes a good recovery.

I have frequent discussions with ministerial colleagues on a wide range of issues.

Mr. Bone: Does the Secretary of State agree that it cannot be fair or democratic for hon. Members from Scottish constituencies to vote on matters that affect only England? The only reason proposals have not been introduced to address that anomaly is that it would be to the Government's electoral disadvantage.

Mr. Darling: No, I do not agree. The hon. Gentleman should read the letter sent to the Financial Times by Professor Vernon Bogdanor, who is an expert on such matters—I believe that he tutored the Leader of the Opposition—and who has pointed out the difficulties in creating two classes of MPs. He has made the case for hon. Members being able to vote on all matters that come before them.

Mr. Amess: Does the Secretary of State realise how offensive his remarks are to those of us who firmly believe in democracy? Given that there is a Scottish Parliament, will the Secretary of State do something to address the disquiet felt among the splendid Scottish Labour Members who feel that the creation of a two-tier membership system for this House of Commons is very wrong?

Mr. Darling: Given the hon. Gentleman's past performance, I look forward to his representing a Scottish seat one day.

Adam Afriyie: Will the Secretary of State explain the precise logic by which Scottish MPs can vote on English laws?

Mr. Darling: Those elected to this House are entitled to participate in all of its proceedings, debates and votes. On his website, the hon. Gentleman makes the point that we need to preserve the British constitution. Our constitutional settlement is currently asymmetrical, but the principle that there should be one class of MP that participates in all proceedings is sound.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, East) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Scottish public have no interest in the West Lothian question, apart from remembering that English Tories imposed the poll tax on Scotland? The Tories object to Scottish MPs participating in English business, but Tory Members are participating in Scottish questions as usual. We do not object to that—in fact, we welcome it—because every time English Tories take part in Scottish questions, support for Labour in Scotland goes up.

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend. I have no objection to MPs participating in any proceedings. I see that the Conservative spokesman, the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell), who is the sole Conservative MP in Scotland, voted no fewer than five times on the Government of Wales Bill last night. In June last year, he voted on special schools and special education, NHS dentistry, council tax and licensing, all of which affect England. I would be interested to know when he established his great principle of not voting on English matters.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): My right hon. Friend knows that Northern Ireland had its own legislature and Prime Minister for 50 years, but it continued to send Members of Parliament to this House. Will he enlighten the House on why the Conservative party supported the right of Northern Ireland Members to vote on all issues before this House during those 50 years?

Mr. Darling: Since 1987, I recollect many Northern Ireland Members voting more often than not with the Conservative party, so the issue was not a problem for the Conservative party. We are seeing sheer, naked opportunism from a party that used to stand in Scotland as the Conservative and Unionist party—now it has given up on Scotland altogether.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State understand the strange logic by which a Scottish borders MP, whose constituents travel across the border daily for work and pleasure, refused to vote on a smoking ban but felt it right to vote on the Government of Wales Bill last night?

Mr. Darling: I find it difficult to follow, too. If I were to represent a constituency from which several thousand people travel across the border every day, I would take an interest in their well-being at work, which might be affected by the smoking ban. I had no difficulty in voting on that matter, and I cannot understand why any other hon. Member would, too.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): May I associate the Scottish National party with the Secretary of State's remarks about Mr. Speaker and our hope for his early restoration to the Chair and to good health?

Let me understand this issue correctly. English Conservative MPs are revolting because the Secretary of State for Scotland is threatening to vote on English education with the Prime Minister, and with English Conservative MPs, but against what any normal person in England would like. Will the Secretary of State for Scotland therefore stop upsetting the revolting English Conservative MPs and undertake not to agree with them or to vote with them on the English Education and Inspections Bill?

Mr. Darling: This cannot be one of the hon. Gentleman's more lucid days. I would say, though, that Conservatives and Unionists should think long and hard about going down a road whereby they would end up in the same bed as the Scottish National party.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the early-day motion submitted by SNP Members on the principled position that hon. Members should not vote on matters not relevant to Scotland. Why, then, have they voted consistently on the Government of Wales Bill?

Mr. Darling: I think that my hon. Friend will find that the nationalists vote when it suits them—there is no issue of principle at all. The big difference between us and them is that they want to break up the United Kingdom. The Conservatives should think very hard before they go down that road.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I associate my hon. Friends with the Secretary of State's remarks about Mr. Speaker and wish him a speedy recovery?

Does the Secretary of State agree that for as long as the Scotland Act 1998 provides for any legislation enacted here at Westminster subsequently to be imposed in Scotland by Order in Council, it is vital that all MPs maintain their right to vote on that legislation? Does he further agree that the only logical answer to the West Lothian question is devolution for England, not the parliamentary gerrymandering of the party formerly known as Unionist?

Mr. Darling: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I am trying to work out which one of his leadership candidates he will support, since I have not heard such a clear exposition of a principled position for some time. The key principle is that we are all elected to the House of Commons in the same way and are all entitled to take part in all the proceedings and Divisions. Once that changes and there are two classes of MPs, there are profound constitutional consequences. What we have from the Conservatives is sheer, naked opportunism. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) will try to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I am looking forward to him explaining why he has managed to vote on so many measures that affect purely English matters, given that he claims that he will not do so on a matter of principle.

Climate Change

4. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): What discussions he has had with Scottish Ministers on the contribution from Scotland to the UK's international climate change targets. [54021]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have regular discussions with Scottish Executive Ministers on a wide range of matters.

Mark Lazarowicz: My hon. Friend will be aware that one of the contributions that Scotland can make to tackling climate change is by tapping our immense reserves of renewable energy. In that connection, I am glad that the go-ahead has at last been given to funding for the development of wave power, such as that undertaken by a company based in my constituency. Given that it took some time for that fund to get going, through no fault of the Government, will my hon. Friend ensure that applications to it are dealt with quickly so that we do not lose the immense advantage that we have in this field and let the lead that we have in this technology be taken by other countries in Europe?

David Cairns: I pay tribute to my hon. Friend for the progress that he is making with his private Member's Bill, which will make a considerable contribution to the debate. I understand that the Committee considering it has a further sitting this afternoon. He is right to highlight the Government's commitment to marine renewables. I welcome, as he does, the announcement made on 8 February by the Minister for Energy of a £50 million marine renewable development fund, building on the £25 million that has already been made available. The company that my hon. Friend mentions, Ocean Power Delivery, has already benefited from some £3.2 million of this development money. The deadline for applications is 8 May, so there is some time left. I look forward to that money going out to those who are successful in getting a grant so that they can carry on with research into the important contribution that marine renewables can make to our energy commitments.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): I associate Conservative Members with the Secretary of State's good wishes to Mr. Speaker.

I am sure that the Minister agrees that Scotland's climate change targets will be best met through a balanced energy policy; that is why I welcome Scottish Labour's decision to support nuclear power. But how will the Scottish Executive be able to deliver on that commitment when the Secretary of State says that the Liberal Democrats run away from hard decisions and fail to face up to their responsibilities?

David Cairns: The hon. Gentleman has a cheek to talk about people running away from tough decisions when the Conservatives have called for a moratorium on the development of wind farms, which make a significant contribution to tackling climate change.

We have said all along that it is foolish to rule out completely the possibility of renewing Scotland's nuclear-generating capacity or having a new generation—that is part of the energy debate. We believe that there will have to be a mix of energy—some will come from renewables, which the Conservative party opposes, and some may come from nuclear, to which some parties, with one or two honourable exceptions, have simply closed their minds. We are taking a balanced view.

John Robertson (Glasgow, North-West) (Lab): As a Glasgow Member of Parliament, may I associate myself with the sentiments expressed about Mr. Speaker?

Will my hon. Friend congratulate the Scottish Labour party on the decision that it made at the weekend? Does he agree that clean coal technology, nuclear and all other forms of energy should be part of a balanced energy policy? Will he ensure that the dinosaurs that still exist north of the border do not stop the process of getting energy for this country through stupid planning means?

David Cairns: The essential question that must be asked during the energy review is: how can we provide the energy that our country needs without wrecking the planet in the process? We have two commitments: we need to keep the lights on and tackle fuel poverty, and do it in a way that is consistent with our international obligations on climate change. Some parties pay lip service to the environment, others pay lip service to the economy, but we have to manage both.

Nuclear Submarine Facilities

5. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Defence on the future of nuclear submarine facilities in Scotland. [54022]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): My right hon. Friend has regular discussions with the Secretary of State for Defence on a range of issues.

Mr. Hollobone: Given the importance of the naval base at Faslane to the Scottish economy, by what date does the Under-Secretary expect a decision on the replacement for Trident to be announced?

David Cairns: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said yesterday in Defence questions that it was hoped that a decision would be made during this Parliament. Of course, the decision does not have to come into force for 20 or 25 years, so there is no rush.

The future of Faslane does not depend on a replacement for Trident. It depended on the Government's decision to base the Astute class submarine at Faslane, which means £135 million of investment in Faslane and the local economy. I hope that the hon. Gentleman welcomes that.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): Will the Under-Secretary confirm whether the Scottish Executive has any form of veto over future nuclear defence development in Scotland?

David Cairns: No, defence is reserved.

Road Network

6. Mr. Stephen Hepburn (Jarrow) (Lab): What improvements are planned to road links between Scotland and the rest of the UK. [54023]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): Traffic to and from Scotland benefits from many of the improvements to the strategic road network.

Mr. Hepburn: In the past decade, one casualty a week on average has occurred on the A1 between Scotland and Newcastle. The road accidents and the road's effect on economic development cause considerable anxiety to residents on both sides of the border. When will my right hon. Friend, in his role as Secretary of State for Scotland, convince himself in his role as Secretary of State for Transport for the United Kingdom that the road needs dualling once and for all?

Mr. Darling: We have many useful and productive discussions about those matters and we happily find ourselves in complete agreement.

My hon. Friend knows that, five or six years ago, my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister commissioned a report on what was required for the A1 north of Newcastle and up to the border, on the basis of which I came to the view that there was neither an economic nor an operational case for dualling the road. It recommended improvements for safety and other reasons and work has continued on working up such schemes. I am surprised that the north-east region did not prioritise them in the recent exercise and I shall have to consider how to proceed in the light of that. Although there is no case at the moment for dualling the road all the way to the border, there is a case for making improvements, especially to deal with the safety points that my hon. Friend raised. I hope to say something further about that, probably in the late spring.

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): When the Secretary of State next lobbies himself, perhaps he could raise the case of the M74 between Gretna and Carlisle. Will he then let us know the exact start date for that project and give us an assurance that there will be no further delays?

Mr. Darling: I hope that we shall be able to make an announcement about that fairly quickly, and that construction will start imminently. Both Secretaries of State will make an announcement at the appropriate time. I must point out that those improvements have been made possible only by the huge additional investment that we have promised, every single penny of which was opposed by Tory MPs, both north and south of the border.

Arbuthnott Report

7. Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): What assessment his Department has made of the Arbuthnott report on electoral arrangements in Scotland. [54025]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said on the day of publication, and as I confirmed in the recent Adjournment debate secured by my hon. Friend on the Arbuthnott report, we now have an opportunity for consideration and debate, and we will respond to the proposals in due course.

Mr. Donohoe: I thank my hon. Friend for that response. I understand the practical problems associated with changing the voting system in time for the 2007 elections, but does my hon. Friend agree that it would be possible to introduce legislation in this Parliament to change it in time for the elections in 2011?

David Cairns: My hon. Friend is quite right to say that we have ruled out the possibility of legislating in advance of the 2007 elections. They are only just over a year away, and preparations for them are very much under way. I want to take this opportunity to thank the members of the Arbuthnott commission for the work that they have done. We now need to respect their work by giving it the most careful consideration possible.

Danny Alexander (Inverness, Nairn, Badenoch and Strathspey) (LD): When considering the Arbuthnott commission's report, will the Minister pay special attention to its observations on the benefits of having a system of proportional representation for UK parliamentary elections? Although that was not one of the report's recommendations, it was a subject on which the commission took evidence. Will the Minister give the matter careful consideration when responding to the report?

David Cairns: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait to see what our response to the report says.

Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld, Kilsyth and Kirkintilloch, East) (Lab): We all welcome the hard work that went into the Arbuthnott commission's report, but many of us were disappointed at one aspect of it in particular, namely that it did not recommend the abolition of the practice of standing in the list and in a first-past-the-post election. Will the Minister assure us that that matter will be considered when these issues come before Parliament?

David Cairns: My hon. Friend is quite right to point out that Sir John Arbuthnott did not recommend that change; indeed, he specifically recommended that it should not be made. No such change will be made before the 2007 elections, and any change that could be made would undoubtedly affect only subsequent elections.

Members' Voting Rights

8. Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): What discussions he has had with ministerial colleagues on hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies voting on the Education and Inspections Bill. [54026]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I have frequent discussions with my ministerial colleagues on a wide range of matters.

Mr. Dunne: Given the anticipated publication of the Education and Inspections Bill later this afternoon, has the Secretary of State been able to assure the Prime Minister that he will be able to rely on the votes of Labour MPs representing Scottish constituencies during the passage of the Bill, which has no jurisdiction over schools in Scotland? How many of those MPs support the alternative White Paper?

Mr. Darling: We discussed this matter a short while ago, and our position remains exactly the same. I suspect that the Conservatives' interest in this issue stems not so much from principle, given that, in the last two general elections, they have managed to get only one MP elected in Scotland. The Conservatives spent more than £1.3 million in Scotland at the last election, and all they got for it was the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell). And to cap it all, they also want him to be a part-time MP.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): We are given 30 minutes once a month to raise specifically Scottish issues. It would appear that the Opposition have conspired to ensure that we end up debating English issues today. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that helps to illustrate why the Tories in Scotland have, to all intents and purposes, been wiped out?

Mr. Darling: I am very pleased that so many Members from different parts of the country have come along today. That ought to be encouraged. As I have said, I believe that all Members should take an interest in every matter that is put before the House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman referred to principle a moment ago. Does he not understand that the basic principle of any democratic Assembly is that Members of Parliament should not be able to vote on matters that concern neither themselves nor their constituents?

Mr. Darling: I do not think that that is right.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): Surely the answer to the so-called West Lothian question is Bill Shankly. When a new offside rule was introduced, allowing a goal when a player was in the penalty box and not interfering with play, he famously retorted that if his players were not interfering with play for 100 per cent. of the time, he would want to know why. We are on the park and we are playing. We are from Scotland, we are from Northern Ireland, we are from Wales. I seem to recall that the Conservative party believed in the Union at one point. In this debate, the only logical conclusion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that this period should be devoted to the asking of questions.

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend makes his point eloquently, and I agree with it. The difficulty for the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell)—the solitary Conservative spokesman—is that in the past year he has voted on a range of matters relating to, for instance, English dentistry, English health care, English education and English local government. I find it hard to believe that he has now discovered a principle according to which he should not vote on those matters. He should recall that his predecessor, the previous Conservative Member, said that he did not vote on English matters, but we learned that he had voted on the Mersey Tunnels Bill.

The hon. Gentleman is getting into a huge amount of trouble. As I have said, it is all driven by the Tories' frustration at not being able to get anyone elected north of the border.

Members' Voting Rights

9. Mr. David Gauke (South-West Hertfordshire) (Con): What discussions he has had with colleagues regarding voting rights of hon. Members representing constituencies in Scotland on matters that do not affect Scotland. [54028]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave to Questions 1, 2 and 3. I suspect that it is remarkably similar to the answer that I shall give him in a moment.

Mr. Gauke: I am grateful to the Secretary of State.

Next month various Scottish right hon. and hon. Members will support the Education and Inspections Bill, including the Secretary of State and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Conservative Members will welcome them in the Lobby on that occasion. Is it not the case, though, that the Bill will not apply to Scotland, and that it is wrong and unfair—and, indeed, recognised to be wrong and unfair by many Labour Members—for MPs to vote on a matter that does not affect their constituencies?

Mr. Darling: Of course, the constituents of the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) go and enjoy an English education south of the border. He therefore has an interest in voting for the Bill, although he does not seem to accept that.

As I have told the House before, it is difficult to distinguish between matters that are wholly Scottish, wholly English or wholly Welsh and matters that are not. We find ourselves in difficulty when we start saying that some MPs have more rights than others. The hon. Member for South-West Hertfordshire (Mr. Gauke) and his colleagues ought to think long and hard before taking a route that is more likely than not to lead to exactly where the nationalists would like them to end up.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that there are two classes of Member of Parliament? There are Members like him and me, who have no say on education, health or criminal justice in our constituencies, and Members who do have that right. Is it not absurd, and grossly unfair, that we intervene in those constituency interests?

Mr. Darling: The hon. Gentleman is right to the extent that there are two classes of MP. There are those of us who believe in the Union of the United Kingdom, and those of us who are against it. I have no difficulty in saying that I support the United Kingdom: that is why I am a Member of the United Kingdom Parliament. I know that the hon. Gentleman believes in breaking up the United Kingdom, but I think that that would be an act of monumental stupidity.

Fisheries

10. Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): What recent discussions he has had with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on the Scottish fishing industry. [54029]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (David Cairns): My right hon. Friend has had recent discussions with the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on a range of issues.

Mr. Crabb: Given that the common fisheries policy has failed so comprehensively to protect either the livelihoods of our fishermen or our fish stocks, what specific steps is the Minister taking to repatriate control of our fish stocks and to ensure that we have a viable fishing industry in the future?

David Cairns: This is another example of the Conservatives and the SNP sharing exactly the same policy, and the hon. Gentleman really ought to question himself very closely whenever he finds that he and his party are occupying the same position as the SNP. During our presidency of the European Council, this Government achieved a good deal last December that will preserve marine stocks and the marine environment, and help the long-term future of the fishing industry. Calls to pull out of the common fisheries policy are a complete distraction from the real issue.

Parliamentary Relations

11. Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the relationship between the Scottish Parliament and the UK Parliament. [54030]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): The relationship is strong and constructive.

Mr. Hands: I thank the Secretary of State for that answer but it is my understanding that under the Scotland Act 1998, Scotland is supposed to have the same electoral quota for parliamentary constituencies as England. Will he look again at reducing the number of Scottish MPs from 59 to 57, thereby henceforth having the same electoral quota as parliamentary constituencies in England?

Mr. Darling: As the hon. Gentleman is, I think, aware, the number of Scots MPs was reduced at the last general election and the quota is broadly the same. The boundary commission recognised that the Western Isles and the Northern Isles present particular difficulties in terms of reducing the number further, but there is now broad parity between constituencies, even allowing for the problems associated with the geographical spread. However, these are matters for the boundary commission and the Electoral Commission, and they will doubtless keep them under review.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

The Minister of State was asked—

Electoral Registration (Barnet)

14. Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): If she will make a statement on the level of electoral registration in the London borough of Barnet. [53918]

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): In the London borough of Barnet, there are probably some 22,000 people who are eligible to vote but who are not on the electoral register, and who are therefore unable to vote.

Mr. Dismore: Does my right hon. and learned Friend not agree that this is a lamentable performance by Conservative-run Barnet council, given that almost a quarter of voters have not been registered? Does this not demonstrate the council's complete lack of commitment to the democratic process? It put out 64 canvassers only last year and it is now reduced to paying them £1.50 per voter signed up; such paying by piece rate is a real sign of desperation. It has not, so far as I can see, taken up the issue of data matching or been imaginative by, for example, trying to register people at supermarkets and further education and sixth-form colleges. Does this not show that the Conservative party really has no interest in democracy?

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend raises an important point. There are probably more than half a million Londoners who are eligible to vote at the forthcoming council elections, but who will be unable to do so because they are not on the electoral register. The important thing is for electoral administrators in all boroughs to find those hard-to-register voters. This is not, by and large, a problem associated with white home owners aged over 55; rather, it is associated more with young members of black and minority ethnic groups who live in private rented accommodation. That is the information given to us by the Constitutional Affairs Committee and the Electoral Commission, and all electoral administrators in London need to work on this issue.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The situation in Barnet—and, indeed, across London—is, as the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) says, disgraceful. It is unacceptable that more than half a million Londoners who should be registered to vote are not. Has the right hon. and learned Lady had a chance to progress the excellent suggestion, made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) during Second Reading of the Electoral Administration Bill, of having a democracy day, on which we can really sell the concept of electoral registration? Can she report such progress to the House?

Ms Harman: I agree with the points that the hon. Gentleman makes, and I pay tribute to the contribution made by the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) to the debate on electoral registration. Those Opposition Members who do not represent inner-city areas, where there are very low levels of registration, might not understand the true position in the way that we do. The point is that our democracy is worth its name only if it is equal, and at the moment it is not equal. Those who are black and young and live in rented accommodation in an inner city are less likely to have a vote. We should all be concerned about this issue.

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that in Islington, which has a Liberal Democrat-run council, only just over 67 per cent. of those eligible to vote have been registered? The Labour group attempted to pass a motion relating to this issue at a council meeting, but it was voted down by the Liberal Democrats. The Liberal Democrat councillor responsible for performance, Terry Stacy, shouted, "That's why we win elections"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady should have read the original question, which is on Barnet. Although she can allude to London, she cannot major on another London borough within the scope of this question.

Constituency Electorates

15. Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): If she will make a statement on Government policy on equalising the number of registered electors per parliamentary constituency. [53919]

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): The Parliamentary Boundary Commission reviews parliamentary boundaries according to the number of registered electors and other geographical and community factors. It will next report to the Government by April next year. That report will be laid before this House, and its proposals will be in force for the next general election.

Mr. Hands: I thank the Minister for that answer, but does she accept that our democracy is being damaged by unequal representation in this House? In that regard, I pay tribute to the work done by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) through his Parliamentary Constituencies (Equalisation) Bill. There are 239 constituencies in this country that diverge by more than 10 per cent. from the national average. They are not confined to English rural areas: my constituency of Hammersmith and Fulham in inner London has 79,807 electors, is the 57th largest in the UK and is more than 16 per cent. larger than the average. What proposals does she have to amend the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986 to correct those undemocratic disparities and to make more frequent boundary reviews—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the Minister has probably got the point.

Ms Harman: I should like to thank the boundary commission for the very difficult work that it does. It is not party political, and every hon. Member has an axe to grind with it but, by and large, the House should have confidence in its work, which is independent, neutral and based on research and consultation. The smallest UK constituency—Na h-Eileanan an Iar, in Scotland, formerly the Western Isles—has only 23,000 electors because it is an island. However, the largest has 107,000 electors, but that is also because it is an island. We must take account of geographical factors, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will join me in looking for the estimated 17,000 unregistered voters in his constituency of Hammersmith and Fulham who do not have the right to vote.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Will my right hon. and learned Friend say what is the Government's policy in respect of equalising the number of residents who are eligible to be registered as electors in each parliamentary constituency? That is a more important question. Merely to equalise the number of people registered would discriminate against people in the inner cities and those who live in private rented accommodation or houses of multiple occupation or who belong to the black and ethnic minority communities. All of those people are less likely to register in practice.

Ms Harman: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The boundary commission bases its estimate of a constituency's size on the number of registered electors. If 500,000 possible electors were missing from the register in London, for example, that total would amount to the number of voters in eight parliamentary constituencies. My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Emily Thornberry) told us about what is happening with her council, but perhaps the hon. Member for North Southwark and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes) should get on to his friends on that local authority and ask them to deal with the same problem there.

Another problem has to do with the electoral administration canvassers who go around knocking on doors to find the hard-to-register voters. There are only 64 such canvassers in Barnet, but in Southwark we have 170. All areas should aspire to the standards of the best in their work to find our unregistered voters.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Surely the Minister is not saying that we should count people who are not registered to vote. How could we possibly guess who they were, or how many of them there were? However, a party that gains the majority of voters in England but ends up with 93 fewer seats cannot say that the system is fair. We need a system that is genuinely fair, so that first past the post works, rather than a flawed proportional representation system. Should not the boundary commission rules be changed so that there is a fixed electoral quota in constituencies across the UK? The Minister may say that the country has plenty of islands, but in reality there are not that many. An equal quota should be the general rule, and the boundary commission's rules need to be changed.

Ms Harman: I confess that I am not following the hon. Gentleman's line of argument—but I hope that he is not criticising the way in which the boundary commission goes about its work. The House agreed, on an all-party basis, what the framework for the boundary commission should be, and that is the framework on which it operates. I am saying that we should estimate the number who are not registered and get those people registered; then the boundary commission's basis would be much more robust.

Members' Voting Rights

16. Adam Afriyie (Windsor) (Con): If she will make a statement on the voting rights of hon. Members representing constituencies outside England on matters relating exclusively to England. [53920]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): Hon. Members are entitled to speak and vote on any issue in this House.

Adam Afriyie: But we must face the fact that there is a constitutional injustice here. To most reasonable people it is illogical, unfair and unjust that Scottish MPs can vote on laws that relate only to England, but English MPs cannot do likewise for Scotland. What specific actions are she and her Department taking to address that democratic inequality?

Bridget Prentice: The Department has absolutely no intention of taking any action to address what is not an inequality. The hon. Gentleman asked the same question a few moments ago, and I was tempted simply to refer him to the answer that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland gave a few moments ago. As the hon. Gentleman voted five times on the Government of Wales Bill last night, I find it difficult to understand why he has difficulty in understanding why every Member of this House has the right to vote on every issue within it.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Could my hon. Friend arrange a series of teach-ins for Members of Parliament who do not understand how long it took to get members of the whole of the United Kingdom—men and women—represented in this House, to explain why they should not lightly, for party political purposes, launch forth on absurd, ill thought-out and farcical campaigns to change that status?

Bridget Prentice: I do not think that my response could put that any better than my hon. Friend has done.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): Does the Minister not agree that if it was iniquitous for English rule to be imposed on Scotland, it would be just as iniquitous for Scottish rule now to be imposed on England?

Bridget Prentice: The hon. Gentleman needs to remember the history of the Conservative—and, at one time, Unionist—party, which imposed laws on Scotland against the wishes of the Scottish people. [Interruption.] I think that everyone knows that I am referring to the poll tax. May I say to the hon. Gentleman—he too voted five times on the Government of Wales Bill last night—that every Member of the House should be treated equally? We should not have two classes of MPs in the House, and matters that affect Scotland are entitled to be voted on by English MPs and vice versa.

Electoral Commission

17. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What recent assessment she has made of the operation of the Electoral Commission. [53921]

The Minister of State, Department for Constitutional Affairs (Ms Harriet Harman): The Electoral Commission is an independent body established by Parliament, reporting to the Speaker's Committee. The Committee on Standards in Public Life and the Speaker's Committee are currently reviewing separate aspects of the operation of the Electoral Commission.

Julie Morgan: Does my right hon. and learned Friend not agree that although the Electoral Commission has independent status, it needs clear, transparent accountability too? Does she think that reporting to the Speaker's Committee fulfils that function?

Ms Harman: The fact that the Electoral Commission is answerable to the Speaker's Committee fulfils an important function, but Members of Parliament can ask Constitutional Affairs Ministers about its work on electoral registration, election fraud and, for example, registration of service voters, so we have that additional transparency. Representatives of the Electoral Commission are also happy to meet individual Members of Parliament to discuss its work.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Will the Minister refer to the Electoral Commission for its consideration the question that has arisen six times since 2.30 pm today? We understand that Ministers do not like English votes on English matters. Do they understand, and could she remind the Electoral Commission, that many English people do not want regional assemblies or extra politicians? Could she ask the Electoral Commission to come up with a solution that would be acceptable in all parts of the House?

Ms Harman: I do not think that that would come within the Electoral Commission's remit. That is not what it was set up to do, and it would be odd and wrong to give it that responsibility, which is a matter for this House.

Judicial Appointments Commission

18. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): How many of her civil servants are being transferred to the Judicial Appointments Commission; and if she will make a statement. [53922]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): No departmental staff will transfer to the Judicial Appointments Commission on 3 April 2006. It is currently anticipated that 80 staff will be seconded to the commission for up to two years. The commission, as an independent body, has the power to recruit its own staff.

Keith Vaz: While I welcome the establishment of the Judicial Appointments Commission, which is a great constitutional change for the judiciary, transferring or seconding staff amounts to the same thing. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is important that the new organisation, which is intended to be truly independent, should start with no staff from the Department, because some may have preconceived ideas about the method of selection or the qualities of particular candidates? Can she give an assurance that that independence will remain?

Bridget Prentice: I can give my hon. Friend the assurance that that independence will remain. I have every confidence that the chair of the commission, Baroness Prashar—of whose appointment I notified the House a month or two ago—will provide the necessary leadership to forge a new and independent body. The JAC will be able to determine its own staffing strategy after its launch on 3 April.

Judiciary

19. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): What steps the Department has taken to encourage the judiciary to interact with other professionals and the public in order to improve mutual understanding. [53923]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): It is for judges themselves to decide the extent and frequency of their engagement with the local community. However, the Department has taken many steps, in conjunction with the judiciary, to interact with the professions and the public, such as the local crime and disorder reduction partnerships of local authorities and local criminal justice boards, local family justice councils, a judges in schools guide, and developing a protocol for case management to deal with delays in care cases.

Mr. Allen: Would my hon. Friend the Minister congratulate the clerk to the magistrates in Nottingham, Mr. Graham Hooper, on convening a conference on Saturday about the community justice options that are now available, including the appointment of community judges? Will she go further and urge all similar colleagues to reach out, so that the criminal justice system can start to play a full part in the attack on antisocial behaviour and criminality, and in the regeneration of our communities? Health services, the police, the education services and many others are involved in that battle, so can we ensure that the criminal justice system also plays its full part?

Bridget Prentice: I certainly support my hon. Friend in congratulating Graham Hooper and his team on the conference that will take place on Saturday. I also add my thanks to my hon. Friend for his part in organising that conference, and I am sure that it will be a great success. I know that he is the chairman of the local regeneration partnership in Nottingham, One Nottingham, whose vision statement of reducing inequality so that no one is disadvantaged is one that we can all endorse. I assure my hon. Friend that we will do all that we can to ensure that the judicial community participates in its local community and that the ideals that he and Mr. Hooper seek to encourage and develop on Saturday are taken further.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): The Minister will be aware of the excellent work of the armed forces parliamentary scheme and the Industry and Parliament Trust. What consideration has been given to helping humble Back Benchers such as me to improve their knowledge of the judiciary, perhaps through day-release schemes—[Interruption.] Perhaps I should say early release schemes. Such a scheme would enable me to spend more time learning about the important role of the judiciary.

Bridget Prentice: I missed the last half of the hon. Gentleman's question. I am sure that he is not suggesting that we should tag hon. Members so that we know where they are. As a fellow of the Industry and Parliament Trust, I recognise how important such schemes are in giving Members of Parliament an opportunity to understand what is happening in terms of other aspects of our country. To further his knowledge, he might like to sit in on his local court and see what happens there. He could also visit the partnerships in his local authority and discover what crime reduction schemes are in place. I recommend sitting in on his local magistrates court for a day as a good way of learning exactly what happens there.

Small Claims

20. Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): What assessment she has made of the administrative procedures for those recovering small claims following a court determination. [53924]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Bridget Prentice): The courts offer a range of effective enforcement methods, each tailored to dealing with different financial set-ups, without which it would be far easier for recalcitrant debtors to avoid their responsibilities to judgment creditors.

Dr. Cable: Is the Minister aware that for people who achieve the feat of obtaining a small claims court ruling there is a major bureaucratic obstacle course involving four separate processes, in each of which there are up to three consecutive applications to the courts with form-filling? Can she get rid of some of that red tape?

Bridget Prentice: I understand the issue that the hon. Gentleman raises, which he has also raised with my noble Friend Baroness Ashton, in respect of one of his constituents. We made improvements in enforcement methods in April 2002. The target recovery for 2005–06 is 85p in the pound, but we are actually recovering 93.8p in the pound, so those improvements are beginning to take effect. We continue to monitor the situation and have publicised further improvement proposals in the White Paper, "Effective Enforcement". Those changes need primary legislation and we shall ensure that it is brought forward when there is parliamentary time.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

Pre-legislative Scrutiny

28. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): If he will make it his policy to enable all Bills to undergo pre-legislative scrutiny. [53988]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): We fully endorse the value of pre-legislative scrutiny. Since 1997, more than 50 Bills have been published in draft and 39 have been the subject of pre-legislative scrutiny. I am keen to ensure that as many Bills as possible benefit from that procedure where appropriate.

Mr. Allen: Does the Minister agree that we make better law when Government and Parliament work together?

Nigel Griffiths: Yes, I do.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): We were all taken aback by that brief and succinct, but positive, reply. I support the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen). If we had more pre-legislative scrutiny, the nonsense of programming nowadays, whereby much legislation goes through without important parts being adequately debated either in Standing Committee or at remaining stages, would be removed, and the House would be a better place and legislation would be better for the people of this country.

Nigel Griffiths: Would that all right hon. and hon. Members shared the optimistic and progressive view of the hon. Gentleman, but the sad fact is that from looking at programme motions of one kind or another over a couple decades I do not consider that pre-legislative scrutiny or any other parliamentary mechanism for scrutiny would stop the inexorable trend for Oppositions to maximise the time for programme motions to complain that there is not enough time. However, I do not want to depart from the present all-party consensus; we support pre-legislative scrutiny and think it should be extended as far as is practical, but there are cases where it is not appropriate or practical.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for North Devon, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Star Chamber Court

29. Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): What the final cost was of erecting the cover over the walkway in Star Chamber Court. [53989]

Nick Harvey (North Devon): The final cost of designing, fabricating and erecting the cover over the walkway in Star Chamber Court was £435,000.

Norman Baker: That is a grotesque sum to spend on such a feature. Is my hon. Friend aware that while almost £500,000 was being thrown away on that absurdity the energy efficiency budget of the House has been cut by 40 per cent. since 1997 and electricity consumption has gone up by 45 per cent? Is not it time that he brought some sanity, common sense and clarity to the House of Commons Commission?

Nick Harvey: The House of Commons Accommodation and Works Committee approved the construction of the canopy in March 2004, after the estates directorates of the House had identified the need to cover the walkway along the east side of Star Chamber Court following the review of access and security arrangements for visitors to the Palace, which led to the plans for the new visitor reception area. The Parliamentary Works Services Directorate developed the brief and design for the canopy in consultation with English Heritage and Westminster city council under grade I listed building and world heritage site status. The requirements of those consultations led to the costs of the project working out at much more than originally anticipated.

Cyclists

30. Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): If the Commission will take steps to improve the signage for cyclists on the House of Commons estate. [53990]

Nick Harvey: The Commission encourages cycling to and from the estate. I am happy to convey to the appropriate authorities any specific proposal that the hon. Lady may have, whether on signage or any other matter.

Mary Creagh: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that reply. I have several suggestions to make about signage. First, there are absolutely no signs around the building warning unwitting cyclists that they should not park their bicycles against the railings. Many is the time that I have seen police officers removing with angle grinders three and five bicycles that have been left there. Will he perhaps take that back to his colleagues and discuss it? The problem—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. One question is enough. Perhaps those matters might better be the subject of correspondence.

Nick Harvey: I am very happy to convey the burden of the hon. Lady's point to the relevant authorities, but increasing provision has been made for cycling spaces in various parts of the estate. Certainly, if there is evidence of further unsatisfied demand, further spaces will indeed be sought.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): As president of the all-party parliamentary cycling group, I welcome the increased provision that is made on the estate, but I strongly endorse what the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mary Creagh) has just said. Those cyclists who come to the Palace of Westminster to lobby their MPs find it very difficult to park anywhere nearby. Will the Commission improve the facilities for visiting cyclists who are trying to save the planet?

Nick Harvey: It has been concluded thus far that, for security reasons, we cannot let visitors cycle on to the estate, any more than we would allow people to drive in to park. For similar reasons, street cycle parking in the immediate area is not permitted, but visitors can use the cycle parking facilities on Millbank.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

European Legislation

31. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): What plans he has to bring forward proposals to reform the way in which EU business is scrutinised. [53991]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Nigel Griffiths): We intend to introduce proposals in response to the detailed report from the Modernisation Committee shortly.

Mark Lazarowicz: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that commitment, but he will know that it has been some years since the proposal for a major change in the scrutiny of EU legislation was first discussed by the House. It is accepted across the House and beyond that scrutinising EU legislation is not something that we do well, so can he give us a more specific indication of when the proposals will be made?

Nigel Griffiths: There have been ongoing discussions and changes in the way we scrutinise legislation in response to the sort of valid point that my hon. Friend makes, and we want to continue such improvements as quickly as is practical.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): The Leader of the House has been intending to introduce such changes for rather a long time now, and those ongoing discussions are apparently happening in the Cabinet, rather than with colleagues across the House, which is a misfortune. Can the hon. Gentleman tell me whether direct discussions were held with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—when we had such a creature—about part 3 of the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill? Quite obviously, there is no point in improving the legislative background to introducing EU legislation if we cannot improve the scrutiny by the House.

Nigel Griffiths: We have every intention of improving the scrutiny by the House. Indeed, the House has been divided on the issue. The European Scrutiny Committee, by the narrowest of margins, made a recommendation on which it changed its mind. That gave problems to the members of other Committees who were considering the issue. So it is not quite as simple as perhaps some hon. Members would make out, but there is the desire to ensure proper scrutiny. Many hon. Members are critical of the amount of legislation that must be passed, some of which is consequential on European legislation, and therefore there is good will on all sides to tackle the issue, but there is not yet an agreed solution. I hope that we will reach that shortly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

The hon. Member for North Devon, representing the House of Commons Commission, was asked—

Braithwaite Report

32. Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): When the Commission will reconsider the need for a review of the Braithwaite report on the administration of the House of Commons. [53992]

Nick Harvey (North Devon): The Commission plans to consider the matter shortly.

Martin Linton: I am glad to hear that, but since the original Braithwaite report recommended in 1999 that there should be a review in five years' time and since seven years have now passed, does the hon. Gentleman not feel that it is high time that there was a review—unless, of course, he believes that the administration of the House could not be improved?

Nick Harvey: The Commission agreed a little over a year ago that, as we were at the end of a Parliament, which coincides with a certain turbulence for House departments, it was not the right moment to start. If we go ahead this year, that will be seven years after the Braithwaite review, which was itself eight years after the 1990 inquiry by Sir Robin Ibbs, so the intervals seem about right.

Smoking

33. Julie Morgan (Cardiff, North) (Lab): What effects the Commission expects the new legislation on smoking will have on the House of Commons accommodation. [53993]

Nick Harvey: The Administration Committee has asked for a paper on that subject and the Commission expects to reconsider the policy on smoking on the House of Commons estate once recommendations have been received from that Committee.

Julie Morgan: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his reply. I am sure that he welcomed the decision made by the House a couple of weeks ago about the ban to be introduced in most workplaces and public places. Does he not think that the House of Commons should take a lead and implement the proposals that we passed as quickly as possible, and that our role should be to lead the nation?

Nick Harvey: The hon. Lady will have heard the answer that I have just given: specific proposals will come from the Administration Committee. It is impossible for the Commission to make judgments on the matter until the exact form of the new legislation and regulations is clear, but those are the sort of issues that the Administration Committee will have the chance to think about. The estate—including the vast majority of the catering outlets—is already largely smoke-free, but I am sure that there is room to go further and we await the recommendations of the Administration Committee.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Can the hon. Gentleman confirm or deny that immediately after the smoking ban was passed in the House, Officers of the House visited Members' rooms to see whether people were smoking?

Nick Harvey: I have no knowledge of that.

BILL PRESENTED

EDUCATION AND INSPECTIONS

Secretary Ruth Kelly, supported by The Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Darling, Ms Secretary Hewitt, Secretary Tessa Jowell, Mr. Secretary Clarke, Mr. Secretary Hain, Mr. David Miliband, Mr. Secretary Hutton and Jacqui Smith, presented a Bill to make provision about primary, secondary and further education and about training; to make provision about food or drink provided on school premises or in connection with the provision of education or childcare; to provide for the establishment of an Office for Standards in Education, Children's Services and Skills and the appointment of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Education, Children's Services and Skills and make provision about the functions of that Office and that Chief Inspector; to provide for the amendment of references to local education authorities and children's services authorities; to amend section 29 of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 in relation to university bodies; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 134].

Trespass with a Vehicle (Offences)

3.32 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to create an offence of criminal trespass with a vehicle; and for connected purposes.

The House is familiar with the many issues surrounding the Traveller population and the local uproar that arises, particularly in rural areas, when a group of Travellers arrive with one or more caravans and set up home on land that they do not own. Such land may be owned by public authorities, most often the county council, or privately owned. Fences and gates can often be broken to gain access. While the Travellers remain, they frequently desecrate the surrounding area, cutting down fences and trees for fires and then leaving piles of rubbish and detritus, sometimes including human excrement. The costs of clearing it all up fall on the local taxpayer or the individual owner of the land.

I am sure that I am not the only one to have had numerous cases of that in my constituency. Recently, in the small village of Swaffham Prior, Travellers camped on the village playing field, preventing the football club from using it and costing the parish council more than £4,000 the first time to clear up and £1,600 the second time in legal fees to get them evicted and to clear up. That is unacceptable. A direct consequence is that property owners, including local authorities, have to take action to prevent access. Large unsightly mounds of earth or rubble are put in gateways and farmers use redundant machinery to block access to their fields. Why should law-abiding people have to do those things?

The House will be well aware that Cambridgeshire is particularly affected by unauthorised encampments. Some say that that is for historical reasons deriving from casual labour for fruit and vegetable harvesting, but a minimal number of Travellers, if any, are engaged in such activities today. A far more likely reason for the large number of Travellers in the county is that successive Government policies have created a honeypot effect. While the Government use half-yearly counts of unauthorised sites to indicate demand, it is inevitable that it can never be satisfied. The Travellers know that and therefore go to the areas where the problem is greatest, in full knowledge that the Government will then put pressure on the local council to provide more sites. Nowhere is that more obvious than in south Cambridgeshire. In the past two years, the number of unauthorised sites has risen by 63 per cent., yet the number of authorised sites has also risen. Last July, at the time of the last count, in the whole of the eastern region there were 325 unauthorised sites on land not owned by Gypsies.

Before I go any further I want to make two specific points. First, most Members of the House know that the village of Cottenham is in my constituency. Unfortunately, it has received a considerable amount of unwelcome publicity over the past few years as the result of a substantial incursion by Irish Travellers. However, this Bill is not directed at that issue because those Travellers own the land, and the problems there are issues of planning and enforcement. The second point follows from that—namely, that not all Travellers cause the problems that I have described. Inevitably, there are generalisations, but illegal encampments, however tidy, must be stopped. In Cottenham, whatever the planning issues, the pitches are generally clean and tidy, although it has to be said that the surrounding area appears to suffer, and certainly a privately owned orchard has been destroyed.

There have been a number of attempts by successive Governments to resolve those problems, some designed to help, some to hinder, but few, I am afraid, have made any difference. Section 34 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 makes it an offence to drive a vehicle more than 15 yd from the highway on to private land without consent, yet there have been few, if any, prosecutions. The Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 gives police officers the power to move on Travellers if the landowner has asked them to leave, and the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 slightly strengthened that legislation as a result of amendments that I tabled. Yet in the last three years there have been no prosecutions.

It is clear to me that more must be done. In doing so, we should look at Ireland, which has addressed the problem robustly. In 2002, the Irish Government made trespass a criminal offence. The result for them was as expected: the problem reduced significantly. The result for us was unexpected—it led to a significant increase in the number of Irish Travellers in Britain. I quote from a letter that I received only this morning from an individual who had seen the publicity surrounding my presentation of the Bill:

> "My wife, who is of Irish descent, and myself often holiday in the Republic where the Irish people cannot believe their good fortune to be getting rid of their problem. There are thousands of these gypsies wanting to come to the UK".

Even allowing for a little exaggeration, that underlines the problem as seen from the Irish perspective.

My Bill does not go as far as the Irish legislation, which made all trespass a criminal offence. I seek only to make trespass with a vehicle a criminal offence if someone does not move on when told to do so by a constable. There can be no ifs or buts about this, and no spurious arguments about welfare—the people in question should have thought about that before they arrived at the site.

My Bill also addresses other activities, not involving Travellers, where motor vehicles are used in trespass. My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) has drawn my attention to serious problems on the Tennyson trail, where off-roaders have killed sheep and caused serious damage to the landscape. Similarly, vehicles are used to gain access to property for an illegal rave, yet the police frequently decline to act to prevent them.

Quite rightly, many people will ask where the Travellers should go. There is a shortage of sites in some areas, and in my view their provision should be included in local plans, but that is not the point at issue here. I came to the House believing that we are all equal under the law. It is not acceptable for some sectors of society to be able to get away with activities which the rest of us could not; nor is it acceptable for owners of private land to have to spend several thousands of pounds obtaining eviction orders and clearing up the abominable mess that is left behind.

I conclude with a reference to a Bill that is currently before the House. Through the Natural Environment and Rural Communities Bill, the Government are, rightly, trying to prevent further damage to green lanes and byways by off-road vehicles. Why bother, if Travellers can continue to use them with impunity?

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Paice, Mr. Peter Ainsworth, David T. C. Davies, Mr. Dominic Grieve, Gregory Barker, Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown, Mr. Mark Prisk, Andrew Selous, Mr. Andrew Turner and Bill Wiggin.

Trespass with a Vehicle (Offences)

Mr. James Paice accordingly presented a Bill to create an offence of criminal trespass with a vehicle; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 12 May, and to be printed [Bill 135].

Orders of the Day

Government of Wales Bill

[2ND Allotted Day]

As amended in the Committee, further considered.

Clause 45

WELSH ASSEMBLY GOVERNMENT

3.41 pm

David Mundell (Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 27, line 32, leave out 'Assembly Government' and insert 'Executive'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 12, in page 27, line 37, leave out 'Assembly Government' and insert 'Executive'.

David Mundell: The purpose of the amendments is to ensure a consistent approach to the devolved Administrations of the United Kingdom. Such consistency has not been evident in much of the debate—we seem to have moved away from the idea that there should be a coherent approach to the devolved Administrations. In Spain, there is something that is often called "asymmetric devolution," whereby different parts of the country are governed in different ways, but I do not accept that difference is needed for difference's sake.

In Scotland for the past six and a half years, the clear and accepted description of the Administration in the Scottish Parliament has been "the Scottish Executive." Were the equivalent body in Northern Ireland fully functioning, it would be called "the Northern Ireland Executive". It seems logical, coherent and beneficial to efforts to promote wider understanding of the functions of the devolved bodies that in Wales we replace the rather uncomfortable phrase, "Assembly Government" with "Executive."

To have a coherent system throughout the United Kingdom, with a Scottish Executive, a Northern Ireland Executive and a Welsh Executive, would allow and promote better understanding of what the Executives do, compared with the Assembly or Parliaments. Indeed, it would also assist debates in this House, because hon. Members' references to "the Executive" would be clearer. A degree of coherence that has not previously been evident would be brought to the whole package if the amendments were made.

As I am sure the Minister knows, the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs thought that "Executive" was a better term than "Assembly Government". The arguments advanced within the Committee have merit, which should commend them to the Minister. I hope that the amendments will be regarded as non-contentious and that they will attract Government support.

3.45 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Briefly, the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) has made a coherent case for the amendment, but I counsel him against building up his hopes, as the hallmark of this Government on naming things is inconsistency. He will recall the debate in which the Government opposed a proposal to call the Welsh Assembly the Welsh Senedd, because they were worried that the public would mix up the political institution with the building. We now have the Welsh Assembly in a Welsh Senedd building, which is typical of the fuzzy logic that we have come to expect on naming. Here is my tuppenny-worth: consistency is needed, but we should also accept that we are aiming to establish a Welsh Government.

Mr. Roger Williams (Brecon and Radnorshire) (LD): My hon. Friend will agree that it is important that the people of Wales should be able to distinguish between the Government and the Welsh Assembly. Too often, the Assembly has taken the blame for poor action by the Government. That contrasts with the golden age of Welsh devolution, in which a Liberal Democrat-led coalition delivered for Wales. The Labour Government, however, do not deliver for Wales.

Lembit Öpik: My hon. Friend has made a brilliant and insightful point, which doubtless makes the Minister's skin crawl as he remembers paradise lost and the brief halcyon era of the Welsh Assembly in which the Liberal Democrats led the way and ensured the only period of stability during the Assembly administration. He makes an important point, too, about the need to distinguish between the Government of Wales and the Assembly as an institution.

In conclusion, the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale rightly pointed out that that can be achieved with his wording, but I would prefer the whole thing to be called the Senedd. On balance, I prefer the word "Government" to "Executive".

Adam Price (Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr) (PC): This is a modest demand, and a perfect opportunity for the Government to concede one amendment to the Opposition parties. We are only talking about a name change—it does not change the concrete constitutional settlement one iota, so I hope that the Under-Secretary will find it in his heart to offer us some charity. Names are important—we know that is the case in Wales, which has a logocentric culture—because they are part of the means by which people understand their political institutions. The separation of powers is one of the most important principles in the democratic tradition, and it has been enshrined belatedly but happily in the new settlement.

The problem is terminological inexactitude, which was cobbled together—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!]. All without notes, I hasten to add. An informal arrangement was cobbled together in about 2000, but it is now being formalised, unfortunately. The phrase is inelegant, infelicitous and inaccurate, and it does not allow us to clarify for the Welsh electorate where political responsibility lies. There is an important principle at the heart of accountability. The National Assembly for Wales includes all the parties that are represented, and its Government includes the party—[Interruption.] I am reminded that it includes more than one party in coalition. We therefore require clarity on the issue.

I am all for constitutional innovation, but I could find only one other example of a national assembly Government in history. The Turkish republic had two Governments at one time—an Ottoman Government in Istanbul and a national assembly Government in Ankara under Kemal Atatürk. That was a difficult period in Turkish history, and it is the one example in history of something like a national assembly Government. It is a misnomer and we should take the opportunity offered by the Bill to bury it. We do not have a United Kingdom Parliament Government. We do not have a Scottish Parliament Government. Why should we be left with the strange phrase, "Welsh Assembly Government"? It mystifies most of us, it will certainly mystify the Welsh electorate, and the Minister should accept this not unreasonable demand from the Opposition parties.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Nick Ainger): I have carefully considered the arguments advanced by the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) and by the Welsh Affairs Committee in its report on the Bill. However, the Government do not agree that using the title "Welsh Assembly Government" will perpetuate confusion over the different roles of the Executive and the Legislature. Rather, changing the title at this stage is likely to cause even more confusion than keeping the names with which people are already familiar. As the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) said, the name has been in place for five or six years. People understand what the Welsh Assembly Government is, and a change to another name would cause confusion.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon) (PC): May I ask a common-sense question? Does not the Minister find the acronym WAG a little silly?

Nick Ainger: No, I do not, and nobody burst out laughing when the hon. Gentleman mentioned it.

Hon. Members referred to the Scottish Executive. In Scotland, the term "Scottish Executive" has been used since devolution and it is now familiar and well understood, but the Government do not believe that that is a reason for changing a term that is now familiar in Wales. I see no problem. It has been argued that there is confusion between the Assembly and the Government. The term "Welsh Assembly Government" provides clarity. It is not a terminological inexactitude, as the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr suggested. It is quite clear. We have no intention of changing the name, so I ask the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale to withdraw his amendment.

David Mundell: I am disappointed by the Minister's response to a reasonable suggestion. Earlier in our consideration of the Bill we were told that it was designed to set the framework for a generation, so it would have been worth taking the opportunity to add a much clearer definition of the roles of our devolved institutions within the United Kingdom. The hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) made a valid point. One of the great challenges of the devolved arrangements is the attempt, particularly under Labour stewardship, to tie in the institution with the Government, and to channel towards the institution any form of public dissatisfaction with the Government. With respect to public services, it is not necessarily the Scottish Executive or the Welsh Assembly that is not delivering, but the Administrations within those institutions, and we need to work further—

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman explain why the Labour Welsh Assembly Government introduced the distinction between the Welsh Assembly Government and the National Assembly for Wales?

David Mundell: The Labour Welsh Assembly Government had to take a degree of responsibility for their actions. Both the Scottish and Welsh institutions are governed by majority decisions, rather than by communal decisions of the entire body. The Welsh Affairs Committee has recognised that the addition of the word "Executive" would provide the new UK devolved settlement with a degree of coherence, so the Minister's argument is unsatisfactory. I will not divide the House on this issue.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman was right to table the amendment. The point made by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas), who has unfortunately left the Chamber—no doubt he was blown away by the force of the hon. Gentleman's argument—underlines how important it is that we never again get into a situation in which an entire institution carries the blame for the errors of the Government of the day.

David Mundell: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. If the Minister had been willing to accept the amendment, common sense would have prevailed. Sadly, that is not the case, but I am glad that we have had the opportunity to put the issue on the record.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 51

LIMIT ON NUMBER OF MINISTERS

David Mundell: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 30, line 25, leave out clause 51.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss new clause 6—Limit on number of Ministers (No. 2)—

'(1) Not more than eight persons are to hold the office of Welsh Minister appointed under section 48 at any time.

(2) Not more than three person are to hold the office of Deputy Welsh Minister at any time.'.

David Mundell: The amendment and the new clause are designed to engender a debate about the appropriate number of Ministers in the Welsh Assembly Government and the difference between full Ministers and Deputy Ministers. We also need to consider how many Assembly Members are not members of the Welsh Assembly Government. If the Assembly contains 12 Ministers, the First Minister and Presiding Officers, then the number of Members available to carry out non-governmental functions in the Assembly is reduced. We must be confident that the number of Members who do not hold Government office is sufficient to scrutinise the work of the Assembly Government.

No such limit was stipulated in the Scotland Act 1998, and it is clear from experience in Scotland that following the arrival of an institution the number of Ministers can grow exponentially. Scotland had five Ministers under the Conservative Government, but it now has 22 Ministers performing the same functions—at a significantly greater cost.

Irrespective of whether one argues in favour of devolution, it cannot be argued that more people doing the same thing is a successful form of it. We must instead focus on whether the proposed number of Ministers is appropriate in light of the value that they bring to the role and the ability of the Assembly's Committees to function satisfactorily. The ability of Committees to function with a number of non-governmental or Presiding Officer Members would leave in the mid-40s the number of Members who are available for Committee work. The provision does not differentiate the role of Minister from that of Deputy Minister, so we could end up with 12 fully paid Ministers.

Throughout the debate, there has been inconsistency about what should be in the Assembly's Standing Orders and what should be in the Bill. We must be clear about whether the Assembly should determine through its own procedures how many Ministers it has. If we are going to determine the number, we must ensure that the ministerial cohort is effective. There is no point in having 12 Ministers simply because the Bill says that there can be that number.

We also need to clarify whether the proposed arrangements are thought of purely in the context of part 3 arrangements. If part 4 arrangements were to come into being, would the number stay the same or need to be revised?

In Committee, there was considerable debate about an amendment that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) tabled and how many Assembly Members were needed to make the Assembly function more effectively, especially in the context of the part 4 powers. Although the amendment was not successful, it is important to focus on the right number of Members for an effective Assembly Chamber.

The Government have already changed their minds about the Scottish Parliament. In the Scotland Act, the Government's initial policy was to link the number of Members of the Scottish Parliament directly with that of Westminster Members of Parliament representing Scotland. I fear that the Government's guiding principle in constitutional matters—expediency—prevailed and the link was broken. The Scottish Parliament will continue to have 129 Members, who no longer relate to the constituencies of Scottish Members of this House. At least that decision led to the Arbuthnott report, about which we have heard much, and has been useful for the debate on the Bill. Indeed, the Arbuthnott report has been discussed more here, in the context of the measure, than in the Scottish Parliament or by the Secretary of State for Scotland.

A difficult position has been created whereby there is no link between Members of Parliament and Members of the Scottish Parliament. That problem would clearly arise in the Welsh Assembly if there were to be more Assembly Members. It is therefore especially interesting, as my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) said, that Labour Members appear to be completely unwilling to discuss appropriate numbers, should the part 4 provisions come into force.

It is appropriate to encourage debate on the appropriate number of Assembly Members to allow the Assembly to function with a Government of the size that the Government propose or in accordance with our amendment. I hope that our amendments will facilitate the debate.

Hywel Williams (Caernarfon): We welcome the definition for Deputy Ministers—it is a fair step forward. I agree with the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) about Committees. We must take care—I believe that the Government in Cardiff will take care—that there are enough Back Benchers to ensure sufficient numbers on Committees. The number of Assembly Members imposes its own limit, given that there are only 60.

We do not want to fetter the First Minister in the way in which he—or even she—might want to appoint Ministers.

The Record of Proceedings for the Assembly's Committee that considered the Bill shows that the Tories in Cardiff tabled an amendment, which would have provided:

"The number of Welsh Ministers shall not exceed 8 and the number of Deputy Welsh Ministers shall not exceed 5".

Perhaps the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale could explain the reason for that change.

David T.C. Davies (Monmouth) (Con): I should like to speak in support of the amendment. As a Member of the Welsh Assembly, I was quite perturbed when the Labour Administration announced that they were creating a new post of Deputy Minister. Such people would appear to want to have their cake and eat it, because in addition to standing in and answering questions for Ministers who are away, they will be able to put on their Back-Bench hat and start asking questions themselves. That would not happen in this Chamber. I have also noticed that, as well as claiming to be Ministers in their own right, they will be able to sit on Committees as Back-Bench Assembly Members.

There is a great deal of confusion about the constitutional role of a Deputy Minister, and it has even been suggested that the position is simply a means for the Labour party to shore up a bit of support on its Back Benches by handing out a bauble that some people might find enough to assure their loyalty. Of course, I would never suggest such a thing, but I support the call of my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) for clarity on the constitutional role of a Deputy Minister and for a firm upper limit on the numbers involved, so that the posts cannot simply be handed out as a way of shoring up Back-Bench support for the Administration.

Lembit Öpik: The problem here is not the concept of Deputy Ministers or the number of them that a First Minister might want to appoint. The problem is that the Assembly is not big enough to cope with the job that it has been given. The Liberal Democrats have proposed to increase the number of Assembly Members in order to get round the difficulties that we are discussing.

David T.C. Davies: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way so soon. Surely he can see that the job of running Wales, which was previously being done by three Ministers in the Wales Office, is now being done by 60 politicians. How many extra Assembly Members does the hon. Gentleman want?

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman forgets that, aside from doing the work of three Ministers in the Wales Office, the Assembly has also taken on the various responsibilities that used to be undertaken by the 40 Members of Parliament who now quite rightly observe the delegation of those responsibilities to the Welsh Assembly.

David T.C. Davies: I hesitate to say this to the hon. Gentleman in public, but he is simply not correct. The role that the Assembly plays now is exactly the same as the role that was previously played by the Wales Office. The Wales Office was previously responsible for health, education, transport and so on, and those powers have now transferred to the Welsh Assembly. We went from having three Members of Parliament performing all those functions to having 60 Welsh Assembly Members doing so. I repeat my original question: how many more does the hon. Gentleman want—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps this is the appropriate moment to remind the House that we are talking about Ministers rather than Members of the Assembly.

Lembit Öpik: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I set that hare running myself. If I may, I shall just give the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) one sentence in response before getting back to the subject of the amendments. I want to remind him that Welsh Assembly Members have responsibilities that were not formerly held by Ministers in the Wales Office. I shall be happy to discuss this with him outside the Chamber; perhaps he overestimates the amount that Ministers did before the Welsh Assembly was set up.

There are insufficient Assembly Members, so we are now having artificially to protect the Committee structure. In some ways, that is an unavoidable consequence of the size of the Assembly. Furthermore, if the Deputy Ministers operate sometimes as stand-in Ministers and sometimes as Back Benchers, it will achieve exactly what we have tried to avoid, which is to blur the distinction between the Welsh Assembly Government and the Welsh Assembly as an institution in itself. Will the Minister explain what firewalls will exist, both psychologically and morally, for someone who can run with the fox and run with the hounds—someone who is occasionally part of the Welsh Assembly Government and who at other times freelances as a Back Bencher?

Mr. David Jones (Clwyd, West) (Con): Is there not more to it than that? Deputy Ministers will be remunerated. Does the hon. Gentleman not share my concern about the fact that what the Welsh Affairs Committee dubbed the payroll vote will account for 20 per cent. of the Assembly? Does he not find that unacceptable?

Lembit Öpik: In proportional terms it is not very different from what happens here in Westminster, so I am not as concerned as the hon. Gentleman on that score. However, it is rather ridiculous for Deputy Ministers to be paid to be part of the payroll vote, while at the same being allowed to act as Back Benchers. If all those positions are taken up, we shall have an enormous, overbearing, burgeoning administrative, and rather centralist, Welsh Assembly. How can the Minister justify an arrangement that seems to muddy the waters between Back Benchers and payroll, which, as other Members have said, we would simply not tolerate in the House of Commons?

Nick Ainger: I am conscious of your suggestion that we concentrate on the amendments, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I will do so, but I want to say a little about Members' comments on whether there will be enough Assembly Members to scrutinise and hold the Assembly Government to account. I also want to say something about the point made by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) about the role of Deputy Minister.

Welsh Members will know what the Presiding Officer, in particular, has said about what will happen after the enactment of part 3 and, possibly, part 4, and about the need for Assembly Members' roles to take account of the additional work that they will be required to do. The Presiding Officer has said that the Assembly should sit for four days a week rather than two. I think that that will cover the extra work load, and will go a long way towards meeting the understandable concerns of many Members about whether 60 Assembly Members will be able to perform the scrutiny role.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Nick Ainger: May I first answer the question raised by the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire about the role of Deputy Ministers? I understand his point, especially in the context of the clear split between Executive and legislature. I would expect the definition in Standing Orders to apply to Deputy Ministers, and given that Deputy Ministers will clearly be part of the Executive, I would not expect them to have the same role as an ordinary Back-Bench Assembly Member; but that is a matter for the Standing Orders.

Lembit Öpik: I apologise to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), who is still waiting to intervene.

[Lembit Öpik]

I fear that if what the Minister says is correct, we shall not have enough Assembly Members to fill the Committees. I assumed that the schizophrenic role of Back Bencher-cum-Deputy Minister had been created because that seemed to be the only way of ensuring that the Committee structure was fully stocked with Assembly Members. Is that not the case?

Nick Ainger: Not necessarily. As I have said, if the Assembly sat for four days a week rather than two, that would probably take account of the fact that four additional Members would no longer be available to sit on Committees.

Mrs. Gillan: As the Minister says, discussions have turned on the proposal for the Assembly to sit for four days a week rather than two. What discussions has he had about remuneration for Assembly Members and Ministers? Does he expect their salaries to increase in line with their increased work loads, or to remain the same?

Nick Ainger: Fortunately, that issue is way above my pay grade; it is clearly one for the Senior Salaries Review Body, as is our own remuneration.

David T.C. Davies: The Minister is talking a lot of sense in proposing to increase the time that the Assembly sits from seven hours a week to four full days, but as Assembly Members have repeatedly said, they already work very hard when they are not there. So there is surely no need to increase their remuneration, because they will not be doing extra work; they will simply be spending more time in the Assembly.

Nick Ainger: As I said, this issue is way above my pay grade and I am not going to get involved in any discussion about Assembly Members' salaries.

Let us move on the amendments before us. It is important to the Assembly's effective functioning that there be a limit on the size of the "payroll vote", so clause 51 sets a statutory limit on the size of the Government within the Assembly. The limit prescribed—a combined total of no more than 12 Welsh Ministers and Deputy Welsh Ministers—is consistent with the current arrangement. It seems to work now and I see no reason why it should not work post-May 2007.

Mr. David Jones: Does the Minister really think it right that, on that basis, 40 per cent. of the Labour party should be on the payroll?

Nick Ainger: The issue is not what percentage of the governing party is in government, but what percentage of the whole Assembly is in government. A considerable percentage of the Labour party is in government in this place, but the issue is the proportion of Parliament that is in government. I shall return to this point in due course.

Currently, there are eight Cabinet Ministers in the Assembly, in addition to the First Minister, and four Deputy Ministers. On comparing that figure with the UK Parliament, it is clear that it is not disproportionate. There are 90 Ministers, including Whips, and 51 Parliamentary Private Secretaries in the House of Commons—21.8 per cent. of its total membership. Our proposed limit for the Assembly, taken with the First Minister and the Counsel General, represents 23.3 per cent. of total Assembly membership if the Counsel General is also an Assembly Member, or 21.7 per cent. if he or she is not. So the proportion is very similar to that in this place.

In the light of that and of the Presiding Officer's suggestion—it is supported by the First Minister—that the Assembly sit post-May 2007 for considerably longer, there should be no problem with scrutiny. However, it is not necessary to limit the First Minister's discretion concerning the balance of Ministers and Deputy Ministers, as the amendment proposes. Should the Assembly have any concerns about the size of the pay bill, it will have powers over Welsh Ministers' and Deputy Welsh Ministers' salaries by virtue of clause 53. I therefore invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

David Mundell: As I made clear to the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) during my initial remarks, our probing amendment is designed to allow the sort of discussion that has indeed taken place, and which has proved very helpful. Although we have strayed into discussing what constitutes the appropriate number of Assembly Members, that issue will require further consideration. However, I take on board the point, made by my hon. Friend the Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies), about the benefit of the Welsh Assembly's working longer hours. Inevitably, the range of Committee activities will put disproportionate work loads on particular Members, although a rough calculation suggests that they are more likely to be Labour Back Benchers at this stage.

It is important that the Deputy Minister role is clarified in the Standing Order process. The Scottish Parliament has provided the model for much of the discussion on this Bill, and Deputy Ministers there are not able to serve on Committees or ask questions in the Chamber. People understand that Deputy Ministers are part of the Executive—or, in the Wales context, of the Welsh Assembly Government. The debate has made it clear that combining the two roles is unsatisfactory, and I hope that the Standing Orders will deal with the problem and clarify the position of Deputy Ministers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) noted, the office attracts a payment. The duties and responsibilities that go with that should mean that office holders are not able to move from being a member of the Government to being a Back Bencher as and when required.

I shall not press the amendment to a Division, as the House has been able to raise the relevant issues. People are worried about the percentage of members of institutions such as this Parliament or the Welsh Assembly who are on the payroll vote—that is, the number of Ministers who are needed for effective Government. The Opposition believe that we should always strive to ensure that the number is the smallest possible. In the hope that the numbers set out in the Bill do not become the norm but will be assessed in the context of ministerial duties, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

PROMOTION ETC. OF WELL-BEING

Mrs. Gillan: I beg to move amendment No. 63, in page 35, line 27, leave out clause 60.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 64, in page 35, line 28, after 'anything', insert 'within their powers'.

No. 65, in page 38, line 19, leave out clause 70.

No. 66, in clause 70, page 38, line 22, , at end insert 'reasonable'.

4.30 pm

Mrs. Gillan: I hope that my voice will be more robust today than yesterday, and that the House will bear with me if I start to fade again.

The amendments are designed to examine clauses 60 and 70. Unfortunately, we did not have time to discuss these clauses in Committee, but their selection for debate on Report gives us an opportunity to get inside the minds of the Government and the parliamentary draftsmen and find out exactly what the provisions mean. This debate also allows us to explore the ambit of the subjects that the clauses cover.

I have looked at the explanatory notes to the Bill, and what they say is worth sharing with the House. Clause 60, which covers "Promotion etc. of well-being", is described as follows:

"This clause provides the Welsh Ministers with a power to do anything which they consider is appropriate to achieve the promotion of the economic, social or environmental well-being of Wales. The power may be exercised for the benefit of the whole or any part of Wales or of all or any persons resident or present in Wales. If the Welsh Ministers consider that it would promote the economic, social or environmental well-being of Wales it may also be exercised in relation to or for the benefit of areas outside Wales or persons resident or present in any area outside Wales."

I have to express a little surprise, as I am sure the Minister will understand, because that is so badly drafted that it needs close examination.

The clause begins:

"The Welsh Ministers may do anything", and I would like the Minister to define "anything", because Ministers may do anything at all that they consider appropriate, without any qualification. They are to be the sole arbiters and have sole judgment. They can do anything whatever—not "anything within their powers"; there is no such qualification—

"which they consider appropriate to achieve any one or more of the following objects—

(a) the promotion or improvement of the economic well-being of Wales".

I challenge the Minister to give me some examples of the sort of thing that he thinks Welsh Ministers may do to improve the economic well-being of Wales, and why they need that all-encompassing power. Paragraph (b) mentions the social well-being of Wales. How does the Minister define that? Is it something that would make Assembly Members happy? Is that an appropriate objective? What is social well-being in the context of "the whole or any part of Wales"?

Next, can the Minister define the term

"the environmental well-being of Wales"?

For example, there is some debate over the nuclear power station at Wylfa B, the jobs there, and the accompanying aluminium plant. Rightly, those subjects have been raised in the House and are of concern to Members. What might Welsh Ministers do in relation to that plant to improve or promote the environmental well-being of Wales? Subsection (1) is very broadly drawn.

Subsection (2) talks about anything that benefits

"the whole or any part of Wales, or . . . all or any persons resident or present in Wales."

I presume that that includes any visiting non-British people, and people coming across the border from England, or from Scotland. Where is the containment of the power? Where does the judgment lie? It lies back with Welsh Ministers, who can decide to do anything that they consider appropriate, without let, bar or hindrance.

Subsection (2) raises many questions in my mind, but if that were not broad enough, subsection (3) would begin to require some serious answers from the Under-Secretary, because it gives Welsh Ministers a "power to do anything in relation to or for the benefit of any area outside Wales, or all or any persons resident or present anywhere outside Wales".

As I read it, that means that Welsh Ministers can do anything that they consider appropriate, with nobody else sitting in judgment on them, for any area or any country—even Ukraine, whose parliamentary system was prayed in aid in earlier debates, or anywhere else in the whole world. How does that sit with the devolved powers and the powers in schedule 5? This section appears to give Ministers the power to do anything for anybody, anywhere, at any time, and the only people sitting in judgment on that are themselves. Ministers have to consider whether their actions are likely to achieve one or more of the objects in clause 60(1), but that section is also at the discretion of Ministers.

Clause 60(4) starts to describe the powers, but it is so broadly drafted that it provides an open mandate. Ministers can "enter into arrangements or agreements with any person".

That makes them competent to do anything that they decide is in promotion or improvement of the three areas that we have discussed. Ministers may also "co-operate with, or facilitate, or co-ordinate the activities of, any person".

Is that provision within the devolved powers in schedule 5, or is the clause drafted more broadly?

Ministers may also

"exercise on behalf of any person any functions of that person".

I hope that they will not be able to exercise any of my functions on my behalf. We need an explanation of who are those persons, what sort of functions will they be exercising—[Interruption.] The Whip says, from a sedentary position, that I am rambling.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): I said, "It's the Ram doctrine."

Mrs. Gillan: I thought that the hon. Gentleman said that I was rambling. My lip-reading skills are obviously not as good as they used to be. I am rambling slightly, because I am perplexed by this clause.

[Mrs. Gillan]

I call clause 60(d) the sleaze subsection, because it says that any Welsh Minister may do anything that they consider appropriate to further the aims in clause 60(1) by providing

"staff, goods, services or accommodation to any person."

Perhaps Welsh Ministers could provide me with a few staff. The Opposition can always do with staff, because support is thin on the ground for Opposition Members. The staff we have are very able, but perhaps I could apply to Welsh Ministers for more staff, or goods and services, or even accommodation when I visit Wales, because it would appear that such provision is within the ambit of clause 60.

Clause 70 is about money. It would give Ministers similar wide powers and I need a decent explanation of it from the Minister. The explanatory notes state:

"This clause gives the First Minister, the Welsh Ministers and the Counsel General the power to give financial assistance (whether by grant, loan or guarantee) to any person engaged in any activity which the Welsh Ministers consider will secure, or help to secure, the attainment of any objective which they aim to achieve in the exercise of their functions. Conditions may be attached to such assistance."

As if it is not sufficient that under clause 60 Ministers may do anything for anybody who is, in their judgment, furthering the aims in subsection (1)(a), (b) and (c), they can also give money, by way of a grant, loan or guarantee, to anybody, anywhere, who is engaged in any activity that

"Welsh Ministers consider will secure, or help to secure, the attainment of any objective which they aim to attain in the exercise of any of their functions."

So clause 70 is not even confined to the aims and objectives set out in paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subsection (1) of clause 60.

Would the provisions cover the granting of mortgages to members of staff? Subsection (2) of clause 70 notes that "conditions . . . may be attached . . . requiring the repayment of the whole or any part".

It thus appears that Welsh Ministers could decide to be the mortgagors of their own houses or the houses of their staff. They could offer grants to businesses coming to Wales—indeed, any assistance whatever. How will the provisions sit with European legislation on offering grants? Under the Bill, anything that a Minister wanted to do in exercise of his or her functions could be accompanied by giving financial assistance to third parties.

Subsection (3) also requires explanation. It states:

"This section applies in relation to the First Minister and the Counsel General as in relation to the Welsh Ministers."

We have already debated the Counsel General and as I understand it that individual need not be an elected Member of the Assembly—anyone at all could be appointed—yet if the section applies to the Counsel General, that person can give

"financial assistance . . . to any person engaged in any activity which the Welsh Ministers consider will secure, or help to secure, the attainment of any objective which they aim to attain in the exercise of any of their functions".

It seems rather strange that the Counsel General, who is not elected, will have power to dispose of taxpayers' money. Why is the Counsel General included in subsection (3)?

I presume that the words

"This section applies in relation to the First Minister . . . as in relation to the Welsh Ministers" mean that the First Minister will be able to make similar decisions in relation to Welsh Ministers. If a Welsh Minister required a residence to further his aims, would the First Minister be able to provide the funding from taxpayers' money, perhaps on advantageous terms? We do not know what conditions would be attached, under subsection (2), to the repayment of any moneys paid out by the First Minister. Will it be a slush fund that allows anybody to have access to any money at any time to do anything that they want?

I could be wrong and it will be interesting to hear the Minister's interpretation of those two clauses, but as they stand, they would pass to the Assembly Government, to Ministers and to a possibly non-elected Counsel General, broad and sweeping powers with no let, stay or hindrance.

I have tabled two small and reasonable amendments and if, after I have listened to the Minister, I am not satisfied, I may want to vote on them. On page 35, at line 38 of clause 60, I propose the insertion of the words "within their powers", to act as a limit or brake on the provisions. Likewise in clause 70, I propose including the word "reasonable", because a test of reasonableness is needed on the wide powers granted under clauses 60 and 70.

I am sad that we did not have time to explore those matters in Committee, but I am grateful that we have been able to do so on Report. I very much look forward to what the Minister has to say about the two clauses.

Nick Ainger: Perhaps I can help the hon. Lady. I will try to respond to all the points that she made, but first I should give a clear explanation of clauses 60, 70 and 71. Clause 60, on the promotion of well-being, has been included so that, together with clauses 70 and 71, Welsh Ministers will have available to them the wide general powers that UK Ministers have inherently as Ministers of the Crown. That is known as the Ram doctrine, which was established, if my memory serves me right, on 2 November 1945.

4.45 pm

Given the nature of the Welsh devolution settlement, we believe that those clauses are the best way to give Welsh Ministers comparable general powers within their responsibilities. That will remove the uncertainty that relates to section 40 of the Government of Wales Act 1998. The provisions will empower the Welsh Assembly Government to pursue a range of actions for which there is no specific statutory power.

The hon. Lady asked for certain examples of how such powers will be exercised. They could include, for example, taking action to promote sustainable development and joint working with other public bodies to improve public services. She asked about the environment, and the powers could include taking action to promote energy efficiency in Wales. Another example is collaborating with other bodies, especially in the public sector, whose functions are not devolved—for example, supporting the police in tackling drug-related issues. Hon. Members have raised such issues on a number of occasions at Welsh questions.

A further example is providing appropriate information to prosecutors—this perhaps relates to the hon. Lady's question about the Counsel General—and regulatory bodies to assist them in considering whether to bringing cases to court. Another example is disseminating information that is of benefit to the public sector or the wider public—for example, joining in a recent campaign on responding to civil emergencies. Those are examples where Ministers do not have the power to intervene to take executive action, but those issues are in line with the responsibilities of UK Ministers. Section 40 of the Government of Wales Act 1998 gives Welsh Ministers certain powers, but these clauses will clarify their roles.

The hon. Lady asked about clause 70 and whether European law would apply to the issuing of grants, state aid and so on.

Mrs. Gillan: The Minister has given some examples, but what limits will be placed on those powers?

Nick Ainger: First, there is a limit in that every bit of expenditure will be subject to the Audit Committee. The hon. Lady suggested that Ministers could offer mortgages to members of staff. Clearly, they would not be allowed to do that: the Audit Committee would jump most heavily on a Minister if such action was considered.

Mrs. Gillan rose—

Nick Ainger: I shall come to the limits of the word "anything", but I was responding to the question that the hon. Lady asked about European law. Clause 70 is subject to Community law rules on non-discrimination and the free movement of goods and services, so any action by a Welsh Minister will be constrained by Community law in that respect.

The hon. Lady asked about limitations on the power of well-being. Other limits are already set out in the Bill—for example, on human rights in clause 80, on Community law in clause 79 and on international obligations in clause 81.

Mr. David Jones: I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) was expressing the concern that, on the face of it, these powers could exceed the powers that are conferred in relation to matters and fields that are devolved to Assembly Ministers. The Minister has already said that the powers would enable Assembly Ministers to exercise such functions "within the area of their responsibility". However, that phrase does not appear in the Bill. Could the matter not be simply resolved and clarified by adopting the wording that my hon. Friend suggests or that the Minister himself has just used?

Nick Ainger: I used that phrase because the Minister for Economic Development and Transport might, for example, want to start giving grant aid to a theatre company that wanted to tour in Europe. That is certainly a distinct possibility and it would be good to promote Wales in that way. The Welsh National Opera already does that. That is why I used the phrase "within their responsibilities". However, as in the case of UK Ministers, Assembly Ministers are not necessarily creatures of statute. They occasionally have to take Executive action that is outwith any legislative provision that they have. That is why we need the clauses in relation to well-being. This is not an unusual way of doing things. The Local Government Act 2000 already gives powers to local authorities to take action and expend money for the benefit and well-being of the people they serve.

Mr. Jones: Does the Minister recognise that the clause could give Assembly Ministers powers to exceed the powers that they already have by virtue of the devolution settlement? My hon. Friend the Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) expressed that concern, but the Minister has not adequately addressed it.

Nick Ainger: I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman does not feel that I have responded to him. All that we are trying to do with the clauses is provide the same powers that already exist in this place. Members do not complain about the additional powers that UK Ministers can exercise, even though Ministers have not got the right, by statute, to exercise those powers. I referred to the Ram doctrine earlier and although I will not bore the House by going through it, it gives a Minister the ability to exercise power when he feels that it is necessary, as long as he remains accountable to Parliament for those actions. Ministers in the Welsh Assembly will remain fully accountable to the Assembly for all their actions and any money that they expend, in exactly the same way in which UK Ministers are accountable to Parliament now.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister tell me whether the provisions were included in the original Government of Wales Act 1998 and, if so, whether they were in exactly this form?

Nick Ainger: The provisions were not in exactly this form, but we are putting them in this form because we are trying to clarify exactly what Ministers can do and what the limits are.

The hon. Lady also asked about a Minister's ability to act outside Wales. I touched on a good example. If the Welsh National Opera was doing a major tour of Europe that could be used to promote Wales and help economic development and tourism, the relevant Minister could subsidise part of that tour as a way of promoting well-being in Wales.

Mrs. Gillan: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way again; at least we are having a dialogue on the matter. If Ministers are going to act within the provisions of schedule 5 and the devolved powers, why does it not say that in the Bill? Why is the Minister, at this stage, giving Assembly Ministers the same level and breadth of powers as full Ministers in the UK? Surely this is another example of the devolution settlement being breached and broadened without people appreciating it.

Nick Ainger: No, to return to the point that I made earlier, section 40 of the Government of Wales Act 1998 already gives similar powers, but these clauses clarify the situation so that there is no confusion. Following advice, we believe that clarification in this form is necessary.

The hon. Lady was asking about Ministers' ability to exercise powers. These are executive functions to be exercised by Ministers and they will be subject to the scrutiny of the Assembly and, certainly, if any funding is involved, to the scrutiny of the Audit Committee.

Mr. David Jones: I am grateful to the Minister for his generosity in giving way. Will he turn his mind to clause 60(4)(c), which gives Welsh Ministers power to exercise any function "on behalf of any person"?

Would that give a Welsh Minister the power to exercise a function given to him on an agency basis by a UK Minister, for example?

Nick Ainger: The well-being power is there to assist the people of Wales. Clause 60(1) sets out the objects to which that power applies. The answer is yes, if it could be shown that an individual outside Wales could perform a duty that was to the benefit and for the well-being of people in Wales, that would not be outwith the clause.

The power to promote well-being is closely modelled on similar powers given to local authorities in section 2 of the Local Government Act 2000. Local authorities, too, were given that power to reduce uncertainty over their powers to act where there was no specific power relevant to what they wanted to do even though it would benefit people in their area. A similar provision was included in section 30 of the Greater London Authority Act 1999, for similar reasons. The power would not alter any existing function of Ministers of the Crown, and there are specific constraints on Welsh Ministers, such as the prohibition on doing anything incompatible with Community law, so those functions do not need to be restated. The power would not override the International Development Act 2002.

Mrs. Gillan: The Minister appears to have made two conflicting statements. I think that I am correct in saying that, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones), he said that under these clauses it will be possible for a Welsh Minister to exercise the functions of a UK Minister. However, he has just said that this provision does not alter the position of a Minister of the Crown. Perhaps I do not understand, but the two statements appear to be conflicting and I should be grateful for clarification.

Nick Ainger: To clarify the point, I am certainly not suggesting that a Minister would be able suddenly to take on the functions of a UK Minister. I am suggesting that, if a UK Minister were in a position to assist the good people of Wales, and there was a requirement for funds to be provided, that would be possible under these clauses.

The amendments seek to remove or constrain the power to promote or improve the well-being of Wales to such an extent that it would become meaningless. It would create uncertainty over the powers of Welsh Ministers to act where there was no specific power relevant to what they wanted to do, even though it would be for the benefit of the people of their area. For the reasons that I have outlined, we believe that the power is necessary, as it has been for local government and the Greater London Authority.

Amendment No. 65 would remove clause 70, which would make no sense. The power already exists for the Assembly in section 85 of the Government of Wales Act, and is being transferred to Welsh Ministers by the Bill. The removal of the clause would restrict the ability of Welsh Ministers to carry out executive functions.

5 pm

Amendment No. 66 is unnecessary. The power in the clause is identical to one in section 40 of the Government of Wales Act. Although the provision is for the Assembly as a whole, the function in question is an Executive function, which is better carried out by Welsh Ministers. Welsh Ministers are accountable for their actions. If their actions were deemed unreasonable, they would be subject to action by the Assembly or by the Audit Committee, and potentially to judicial review.

Mrs. Gillan: Will the Minister deal with my question about the Counsel General, please?

Nick Ainger: I think that I touched on that. The Counsel General would be in a position to expend moneys to ensure that prosecutions took place, and I specifically mentioned that he could take action to assist other authorities in bringing prosecutions. Although he would not be given specific powers under schedule 5 or following the enactment of part 4, the Counsel General would be able to assist other authorities in bringing prosecutions; at present, no statute gives him the power to do that.

We have had a good explanation. I hope that I have reassured the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham that the powers are not, as she suspects, huge and wide-ranging, unrestricted either by statute or by the Assembly. Far from it. We are making sensible arrangements so that Welsh Ministers can exercise Executive functions to benefit the people of Wales. I ask her to withdraw the amendment.

Mrs. Gillan: I understand why, from time to time, Ministers—whether in Westminster or in the Assembly—need to exercise Executive powers, but I am not fully satisfied by the explanation that the Minister has given. A lot of points still need to be clarified, and it is unfortunate that we will not be able to do that at this stage. The fact that the clauses are closely modelled on provisions for the Greater London Authority and local authorities has little bearing, because, as we have often heard, the Assembly in Wales is different from the Greater London Authority and local authorities. If there are similarities, one would hope for consistency across government and that Ministers would apply the changes that they intend to make to the electoral system in Wales to the electoral arrangements for the GLA and the Scottish Parliament.

The way in which the Minister has presented his explanation has led to confusion. I am not entirely convinced that under the clauses as drafted it would not be possible for a Minister to take on the functions of a Member of this House or a member of the Government on an agency basis. His assurance that the clauses clarify and limit what Ministers can and cannot do is as nothing, because there is nothing limiting in them. Ministers may well be subject to scrutiny by the Assembly—so they should be—and by the Audit Committee; none the less, the powers given under the two clauses remain unfettered.

I want Welsh Ministers and the Assembly always to do things that assist the people of Wales, but I do not want them to have powers that could be abused or are wider than they should have at this stage. To bring Welsh Ministers into line with UK Ministers is yet another way of devolving by the back door.

Once again, the Government should have been honest about devolution, and perhaps they should have gone the whole hog and held a referendum. However, they have not done so—they are salami-slicing, as the Father of the House has said. The provision is another slice of salami, and it is being made by stealth, rather than in an open fashion. Amendments Nos. 64 and 66 are small amendments, as I mentioned. They do not fundamentally alter Ministers' ability to ensure the well-being of Wales, but they clarify the position and provide the limits that the Under-Secretary believes exist in clauses 60 and 70 as drafted.

Lembit Öpik: I sense that the hon. Lady may wish to divide the House so, for the record, I wish to say that, for once, I was persuaded by the Minister's argument. It is a judgment rather than a principle, but is she not being a little pedantic in pursuing her concerns? The Minister made a cogent argument about the Government's intentions and, in my assessment, it would be useful, rather than harmful, to retain those provisions as drafted.

Mrs. Gillan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The amendments do nothing but set fairly broad parameters. By adding the words "within their powers" to clause 60 we would ensure that we stick both to the letter of the law and to the intention behind devolution by limiting Ministers' powers. That may be taken as read, but I would prefer to see such a limitation included in the Bill. Likewise, the insertion in clause 70 of the word "reasonable" would not undermine the spirit of the provision, and would ensure that a test of reasonableness can be applied to the broad powers of financial assistance in the clause.

Lembit Öpik rose—

Mrs. Gillan: I am being very generous.

Lembit Öpik: As the hon. Lady says, she is being generous and, indeed, modest. I think that she is saying that amendment No. 64 does nothing but clarify clause 60. Taken as a package, however, the amendments do rather more, and would remove the clause.

Mrs. Gillan: I merely wish to press amendments Nos. 64 and 66—I do not wish to press the remaining amendments any further. I wish not to wreck the existing provisions, but to provide clarity and certainty, which have not been afforded by the way in which the Bill has been drafted.

May I hasten to comfort the hon. Gentleman? I certainly do not wish to remove clauses 60 and 70. In fact, the original proposal to delete those clauses was designed to enable Committee members to discuss the subject. We were not given the time to hold such a discussion in Committee so, unfortunately, we must do so on Report. The insertion of the words "within their powers" in clause 60 and the addition of the word "reasonable" to clause 70 do not wreck the existing provisions. I have gone a long way towards accepting the Minister's explanation, and the amendments have the best interests of the Welsh people and Wales at heart. However, they provide a safeguard so that Ministers act within their powers. They offer, too, a test of reasonableness on the financial assistance that Ministers may, or may not, give.

I accept the Minister's explanation about the Counsel General, but, again, a test of reasonableness would not go amiss. I am rather sad that the Minister could not accept those small amendments, but I should not be surprised as there has been very little give and take at the Dispatch Box during the passage of the Bill. It is a shame, however, as consensus could easily have been achieved on many of these issues. With a heavy heart, I seek the leave of the House to press amendments Nos. 64 and 66 to a vote, and I urge my hon. Friends to join me in the Lobby.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 64, in page 35, line 28, after 'anything', insert 'within their powers'.—[Mrs. Gillan.]

The House divided: Ayes 221, Noes 282.

Clause 75

Business Organisations

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): I beg to move amendment No. 62, in page 41, line 4, leave out clause 75.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): With this it will be convenient to discuss new clause 12—Business scheme—

'(1) The Welsh Ministers must make a scheme ("the business scheme") setting out how they propose, in the exercise of their functions, to take account of the interests of business.

(2) The business scheme must specify how the Welsh Ministers propose—

(a) to carry out consultation about the exercise of such of their functions as relate to matters affecting the interests of business, and

(b) to consider the impact of the exercise of their functions on the interests of business.

(3) The Welsh Ministers—

(a) must keep the business scheme under review, and

(b) may from time to time remake or revise it.

(4) Before making, remaking or revising the business scheme, the Welsh Ministers must consult such organisations representative of business (including trade unions) and such other organisations as they consider appropriate.

(5) The Welsh Ministers must publish the business scheme when they make it and whenever they remake it; and, if they revise the scheme without remaking it, they must publish either the revisions or the scheme as revised (as they consider appropriate).

(6) If the Welsh Ministers publish a scheme or revisions under subsection (5) they must lay a copy of the scheme or revisions before the Assembly.

(7) The Welsh Ministers must—

(a) within the period of two years beginning with the day on which the business scheme is first made, and

(b) subsequently at intervals of no more than two years, publish a report of how the proposals set out in the business scheme have been implemented.

(8) The Welsh Ministers must lay before the Assembly a copy of each report published under subsection (7).'.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I am pleased to move the amendment and support the new clause because their purpose is to recognise the interests of business throughout Wales. I was especially pleased that, on Second Reading, when my hon. Friend the Member for

[Huw Irranca-Davies]

Newport, East (Jessica Morden) and I spoke for such a provision, the Under-Secretary appeared to respond favourably. Now that it has been drafted accurately—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members who are leaving the Chamber or holding conversations in the Chamber please leave quickly and quietly?

Huw Irranca-Davies: I am especially pleased that business interests are recognised in the amendments as being those not solely of employers but of employees. They are tied together in new clause 12 so that the voice of the trade unions and employees is equally important to that of employers. When we talk about developing the economic, environmental and social well-being of Wales, as we did in our previous discussion, the business community should have a powerful say.

We tabled the amendments to ensure that the voice of the business sector—employees and employers—was recognised and included in the Bill in the same way as that of the voluntary sector and the public sector. Subsection (4) of new clause 12 refers to "organisations representative of business (including trade unions) and such other organisations as they consider appropriate."

That is why the amendment and new clause have the support of not only the TUC in Wales but the Wales Trades Union Council.

The amendments were tabled in the spirit of consensus. They have the backing of the people, business organisations and employee organisations in Wales. I hope that not only the House but the Under-Secretary will support them.

The new clause proposes that reports be made at intervals of no more than two years, rather than yearly, as will apply to the voluntary and public sector schemes. In defence of that slight deviation from the other two schemes, I would say that this is precisely what the unions and employers in the business community have asked for. They recognise the need for openness and transparency in reporting back, but they believe that it could be extremely cumbersome if that were to be an annual requirement. They would prefer the period to be up to two years.

I hope that amendment No. 62 and new clause 12 will garner the support of the House today.

5.30 pm

Adam Price: I am happy to support the amendment moved by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). It was made clear by Ministers at the time of the passing of the Government of Wales Act 1998 that trade unions were meant to be included in the ambit of business organisations, but the amendment makes that absolutely explicit. It should be welcomed for that reason in particular, but also because it clearly sets out the requirement for consultation with social and economic organisations—as I prefer to call them—in a way that is consistent with the schemes that apply to other sectors. This would be widely welcomed by many including the Wales TUC, whose response to the consultation conducted by the Welsh Assembly Government on business consultation made it clear that the TUC wanted a formal basis for the inclusion of trade unions and a structured process to be put in place.

That sentiment has been echoed by the main representatives of the private sector. The CBI has called for a scheme along similar lines to those proposed by the hon. Members for Ogmore and for Newport, East (Jessica Morden). Other business organisations, including the West Wales Chamber of Commerce and the Federation of Small Businesses, have made a plea that the general duty to consult business organisations needs a proper structure in terms of its mechanism and its timetable, similar to that proposed by the hon. Gentleman. I hope that this will not have to be a Labour rebellion, and that the Minister will finally accept a substantial amendment, because it has garnered considered support on both sides of the House. I shall listen with optimism to the Minister's response in due course. Meanwhile, we are happy to offer our support for the proposals.

Jessica Morden (Newport, East) (Lab): In speaking to the amendment and the new clause, I support the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). I also acknowledge that the Welsh Assembly Government has a good, constructive relationship with business and the trade unions in Wales, which is illustrated by the work that is being done through the Business Partnership Council.

Clauses 72 and 73 provide that Welsh Ministers must establish the Business Partnership Council with local government and place a duty on the Welsh Assembly Government to consult and advise local government, and to set up and publish a local government scheme. Clause 74 provides that Welsh Ministers must set up a voluntary sector scheme to explain how they will work and consult with the voluntary sector in Wales. Yet clause 75 calls for Ministers only to carry out consultations with "such organisations representative of business and such other organisations as they consider appropriate".

The obligation in the Bill to consult business is therefore considerably weaker than the obligations relating to local government and the voluntary sector, and it contains no reference to trade unions representing employees.

It is important to recognise that business and the trade unions play a key role in developing Wales. The new clause acknowledges that and proposes a similar arrangement for business and the unions, to be known as "the business scheme". That would enable the public to see what Welsh Ministers are committed to do for business. Relations with business and trade unions are currently good, but future Administrations would have an obligation to ensure that that continued. The scheme would also ensure that the role of the trade unions was formally acknowledged. Welsh Ministers would have a duty to consult them, and the views of workers in Wales would be heard when decisions were made by the Welsh Assembly Government.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for considering opinions that have the support of the CBI and the TUC in Wales. I hope that the Minister will support the new clause.

Mark Williams (Ceredigion) (LD): We support the amendment and, in particular, the new clause. The amendment touches a nerve among many businesses, especially small businesses, which feel that any existing consultation arrangements are not working very well. The new clause sets out the proposed arrangements very clearly, especially the monitoring arrangements.

Clause 75 refers to "consultation with ... organisations as they consider appropriate".

I remind Members of the importance of organisations such as the Mid Wales Manufacturing Group and chambers of trade throughout Wales. I hope that the new clause will enable their views to be taken into account.

Mrs. Gillan: I hope that the Minister will tell us whether what is proposed in new clause 12 could be dealt with by clauses 60 and 70, which we have just discussed. I should also like to know whether he has any idea of the cost of the business scheme. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies) has estimated the cost, the time and the number of staff involved. Would any extra staff be needed?

The recent Ministry of Defence withdrawals have affected the deep servicing base at St Athan, which has caused a great deal of concern. I hope that if the Minister accepts new clause 12 or any similar proposal—which I doubt very much; he does not look as though he is in an accepting mood—there will be appropriate consultation with representatives of those working in such areas.

Huw Irranca-Davies: There would undoubtedly be consultation with various organisations, large and small. The hon. Lady will have noted another slight difference between the new clause and the clauses relating to the public and voluntary sectors: there is no duty to sustain. The independent nature of the business community is reflected in the slightly different wording. While the requirement for consultation is absolutely correct, I do not see the need for a duty to step in and sustain a business. I do not think that any of us would want that.

Mrs. Gillan: That answers one of my questions.

New clause 12(7) states that "within the period of two years beginning with the day on which the business scheme is first made, and ... subsequently at intervals of no more than two years", reports must be presented on "how the proposals set out in the business scheme have been implemented."

The period of two years seems to be arbitrary, plucked out of the air. Perhaps the Minister will comment.

Huw Irranca-Davies: As I have said, the TUC and the CBI support the amendment and the new clause, but that proposal follows a request from them. They consider the procedure more manageable and operable than the onerous duty of publishing a report every year. They appreciate the transparency, but do not want a commitment to annual reporting.

Mrs. Gillan: I am grateful for that intervention. I realise that the proposal is supported by the CBI and the TUC—I merely wanted to know why a period of two years is preferred to, say, three, five or 10 years, as is normal with a business plan. However, I look forward to hearing what the Minister has to say in response to new clause 12 in particular.

Nick Ainger: Surprise, surprise, Madam Deputy Speaker—we accept and welcome the amendment and the new clause, and I am sure that everyone welcomes that. The Welsh Assembly Government have worked closely with the business community, including the trade unions, and I expect that they will continue to do so. The new clause, which is a sensible addition to the Bill, is designed to ensure that all parts of the Welsh Assembly Government take the impact on business into account when drawing up policy. I also welcome its clarifying the position of trade unions within the business scheme.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) asked why such matters could not be dealt with under clauses 60 and 70—

Mrs. Gillan: Do not such powers already exist under clauses 60 and 70? Welsh Ministers could use the powers granted by their wide provisions to take precisely such action, if they wished.

Nick Ainger: The point is that under the terms of clauses 60 and 70, Ministers would choose whether to take such action. The new clause puts the scheme on a statutory footing—an option that Ministers clearly could not exercise under clauses 60 and 70.

The extra costs involved will be minimal. The point is to ensure that regulations emerging from the Assembly are made with the involvement and agreement of all parts of industry, which is why we welcome the new clause.

Mrs. Gillan: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way again. He says that the cost will be minimal and I presume, given that he is going to accept the new clause, that he has had a chance to calculate in detail the costs and staffing necessary to implement it. Will he agree to place in the Library of the House those detailed calculations, which would be helpful? Will he also justify to the House the two-year period, so that I can satisfy myself that another period would not be more optimal?

Nick Ainger: I am assured that the costs are minimal as most of this work is already being done by Assembly officials. All sides of business and industry have decided that they want a scheme that can be reviewed every two years. The new clause takes on board their views and I would be amazed if the hon. Lady disagreed with them.

In conclusion, I welcome the new clause and I commend it to the House.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I am very pleased to see not only cross-party support for the new clause but support from throughout the Labour Benches. The Minister has given his support not just to the principle behind the new clause, as he did on Second Reading, but to the new clause itself. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Jessica Morden) pointed out, there is already a good working relationship between the Assembly and business. However, the new clause will formalise the Assembly's relationship not only with employers' organisations, but with employees. I am grateful for such support and I thank the Minister for his consideration.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 50, line 7, leave out clauses 92 to 101.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 5, in page 50, line 17 [Clause 92], at end insert

'; and the Assembly may by resolution request that the Parliament of the United Kingdom legislate on any matter specified in Part 1 of Schedule 5.'.

No. 59, in page 51 [Clause 94], leave out lines 29 to 31.

No. 60, in line 38, leave out subsections (7) and (8) and insert—

'(7) The Secretary of State must, before the end of the period of 30 days beginning immediately after the day on which notice of the Assembly's resolution is received, submit the draft to the Clerk.

(8) It is for the Clerk to submit draft Orders in Council for approval by Her Majesty in Council.'.

No. 61, in page 52, line 7 [Clause 95], leave out '60' and insert '30'.

No. 7, in page 89 [Clause 160], leave out line 23.

New clause 1—Referendum about commencement of Assembly Measure provisions—

'(1) Her Majesty may by Order in Council cause a referendum to be held throughout Wales about whether the Assembly Measure provisions should come into force.

(2) If the majority of voters in a referendum held by virtue of subsection (1) vote in favour of the Assembly Measure provisions coming into force, the Assembly Measure provisions are to come into force in accordance with section 92.

(3) But if they do not, that does not prevent the making of a subsequent Order in Council under subsection (1).

(4) No recommendation is to be made to Her Majesty in Council to make an Order in Council under subsection (1) unless a draft of the statutory instrument containing the Order in Council has been laid before, and approved by a resolution of, each House of Parliament and the Assembly.

(5) But subsection (4) is not satisfied unless the resolution of the Assembly is passed on a vote in which the number of Assembly members voting in favour of it is not less than two-thirds of the total number of Assembly seats.

(6) A draft of a statutory instrument containing an Order in Council under subsection (1) may not be laid before either House of Parliament, or the Assembly, until the Secretary of State has undertaken such consultation as the Secretary of State considers appropriate.

(7) For further provision about referendums held by virtue of subsection (1) see Schedule 6.

(8) In this Act, "the Assembly Measure provisions" means sections 92 to 101.'.

New clause 3—Scrutiny of proposed Orders in Council by Joint Scrutiny Committee—

'(1) There shall be a Joint Scrutiny Committee (in this section, "the Committee") that shall scrutinise every Order in Council made pursuant to section 94 of this Act and report on its expediency to the House of Commons and to the National Assembly for Wales.

(2) The Committee shall consist of ten Members of the House of Commons and ten Members of the National Assembly of Wales.

(3) The Committee may choose its own Chairman and determine its own procedure.'.

5.45 pm

Mr. Grieve: Clauses 92 to 101 make up part 3 of the Bill, which deals with Assembly measures. We debated these provisions in detail and at length in Committee, but I was left entirely unpersuaded by the Government's arguments about the proposals' necessity or desirability.

The House must bear it in mind that these clauses would mean that primary legislation would cease to be the responsibility of this House—or any Assembly or Parliament—and be replaced by a system of government through Order in Council. It would be difficult to imagine a more fundamental shift from the normal convention and practice in our country's constitution, although the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill tries to extend the same principles to the entirety of the governance of this country, including England.

It became clear in the course of our Committee debates that the Government simply did not grasp the extent of the change that these proposals would introduce. We were told that the measures were perfectly reasonable, and that Orders in Council are commonly used. I accept the latter point, but they are not used for enacting measures that are normally the preserve of primary legislation. However, that is precisely the system that we will be introducing if we allow these clauses to go through.

Parliament gives power to the Executive. The Government have argued that they want to devolve power so that it is brought closer to the people, but where will that power be exercised? That is the important question, as clauses 92 to 101 make it glaringly apparent that the exercise of the power supposedly to be transferred to the Assembly will remain entirely at the discretion of the Secretary of State.

For example, clause 94(7) allows the Secretary of State the right to refuse to enact a draft order proposed by the Assembly. Parliament will have an opportunity to vote on such a draft order, but will be able to see it only in draft form. We will not be able to see the order in its final form.

Nick Ainger indicated dissent.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister shakes his head. Perhaps I have chosen my words badly, but in Committee we established that Parliament will be presented with a draft Order in Council and asked to decide whether it should go ahead. However, it will not be able to determine whether the order in its final form, as put together by the Welsh Assembly, should be approved. That is because, at that stage, the Secretary of State is the only person with the power to intervene and prevent a measure from being enacted. If I have got any of that wrong, I shall be pleased to give way to the Minister so that he can correct me.

Nick Ainger: I shall try to help the hon. Gentleman with how the system will work. The Welsh Assembly will propose an Order in Council, which will then be subjected to pre-legislative scrutiny, when it can be amended. After that, the Assembly will consider any changes and introduce a draft Order in Council. That draft order will then be laid before the House by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and the normal affirmative procedure, both here and in the House of Lords, will apply. It is not the measures that will come before Parliament in any form, but the policy statement justifying why the Order in Council is required. There will be a substantial amount of information attached to that, and it will be subject to pre-legislative scrutiny. I hope that that clarifies the matter for the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Grieve: It certainly clarifies the matter up to a point, and it sounds even worse than I originally thought. In Committee I understood that although the House would vote on the draft Order in Council, there would be an opportunity for the House to scrutinise the actual draft measure. The Minister shakes his head and says that that is not the case, but I have to express some surprise. That is not at all what I remember.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that what is being removed from Parliament are precisely the rights that were not afforded to it by dictatorial monarchs down the ages? This activity is at the heart of what Parliament does, and either the Welsh Assembly should do it or this place should. It is unacceptable for no one to do it.

Mr. Grieve: I agree with my right hon. Friend; that is the matter that was of such concern to us in Committee. We tabled amendments to try to beef up the procedures, but they were all rejected. That is why I shall invite the House to take out the entirety of this part of the Bill. In my view, it has no place in the architecture of the legislation—and indeed, it is completely unnecessary.

If the Government were honest and true to their principles they would have no hesitation in putting the idea of Acts of the Assembly to a referendum, getting the necessary powers and handing those powers to the Welsh Assembly. There are arguments both in favour of and against further devolution, but at least that would have some intellectual honesty about it, whereas what is now proposed is a hybrid system that will grossly undermine this House's ability to scrutinise legislation, but will not give the Welsh Assembly any measure of sovereign control over its own legislation.

The matters in schedule 5, part 1—all important areas of legislation for the people of Wales—will be determined by a sort of minuet danced between the Secretary of State and the Assembly, in which the Secretary of State ultimately exercises all the control. A measure more calculated to undermine the principles of parliamentary democracy would be difficult to find. However, having seen the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, and what the Government seek to impose on the country more generally in that measure, we should not be surprised by what they are doing to the people of Wales, who are being treated as guinea pigs for their proposals elsewhere.

The longer we debated this issue in Committee, the less persuaded I was that these measures were necessary. If the Government had the courage to bring devolution a further notch forward, they would accept the need for a referendum and Assembly Acts. Moreover, there are so many downsides to the proposals, which risk producing an environment in which the ability to scrutinise legislation and determine it properly will be seriously undermined.

Adam Price: Does the shadow Attorney-General see any contradiction between his proposal to delete part 1 of schedule 5 and the position taken by the leader of his party in the Assembly, who has voted, and called, for extending schedule 5 to include new areas such as energy?

Mr. Grieve: Not at all; this highlights the nub of the issue. It is possible to have a perfectly reasoned debate about whether the Welsh Assembly should be granted more powers. I am aware that within Wales, and outside it, there will be people with different opinions on that subject. There are perfectly valid arguments that Wales should follow the pattern of Scotland and have primary legislative powers, and that the Welsh Assembly should acquire sovereign authority over areas of legislative competence, if that is what is desired. That, in a sense, is what the Government propose in part 4.

I shall make something clear again, both to the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) and to the Minister—and, indeed, to anybody else. We have said all along that if that is what the Government seek to do, it is right that they should put it to the people of Wales, and if the people of Wales want it, they should have it. That is why we shall certainly not oppose the measures in part 4.

My colleagues in the Welsh Assembly have views on that subject, and are perfectly entitled to argue that greater powers should be devolved to Wales. That is what an evolving democracy is about—just as people are also entitled to argue that that should not happen. My objection is not to the principle that there might be further devolution to Wales, but to the hybrid system that the Government seek to set up to avoid having to ask the Welsh people a referendum question, because they know that would be embarrassing within their own party.

Mr. Gummer: Does my hon. Friend accept the fact that I believe in further devolution, and that, as we have taken this step, I would like the Welsh people to make many more of their own decisions? There are arguments about whether we should have devolution at all, but now that it has been introduced, it ought to be effective. What is so dangerous is the fact that we are evolving a system in which the prime player is neither the Welsh people through their Assembly, nor the United Kingdom people though the United Kingdom Parliament, but the Government through executive action. That is intolerable and undemocratic.

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely. This is a creeping process, which has probably been going on for some time. This Parliament has been successively surrendering powers of legislative competence through the greater use of statutory instruments and Orders in Council for a long time. In 1966 there were, I think, 35 statutory instruments, whereas there are now some 3,000 to 4,000 a year. That is already a measure of the loss of competence—but at least in key areas of primary legislation, historically we have kept the competence. That is what we are surrendering now.

As I have said, if I were being asked to surrender that competence to a Welsh Assembly taking over our powers, I might argue against that because of my attitude to devolution, but I could not fault it as a procedure. I also have to acknowledge that in the Scottish context, that has worked quite well. However, I am not prepared to surrender the power of this House to scrutinise and enact legislation to a system that very considerably increases the power of the Executive.

Lembit Öpik: I am trying to understand the Conservatives' position on this matter, because that would help us to see what the hon. Gentleman seeks to do with his amendments. Can he clarify the definitive Conservative party policy? As the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) has pointed out, there seems some confusion between what the leader of the Conservatives in Wales was saying and what the hon. Gentleman is saying now.

Mr. Grieve: I am afraid that the only confusion is in the hon. Gentleman's mind. The Conservative party's position is extremely straightforward: any increased devolved powers for the Welsh Assembly should come through part 4. If the people of Wales want those devolved powers, they can have them by voting in a referendum under part 4. If they chose to have them in that way, our party's task would be to facilitate that process and make it work effectively.

The Conservative party—the official Opposition—will not at any stage subscribe to a system of governance that removes legislative competence from everybody and hands it to the Executive. I hope that that is now clear to the hon. Gentleman, and that he understands exactly where we stand.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Bill would make it easier for the Government to impose regional government in the west midlands without offering a referendum?

Mr. Grieve: It is true that the people of Wales will have no referendum on the part 3 proposals. My hon. Friend will have noticed that one of our amendments would require a referendum to be held. The people of Wales should be consulted on whether they wish to be governed by Order in Council, but the Government have never consulted the people of Wales on part 3. It was dreamt up by bureaucrats and will be imposed on the people of Wales. It suits the Government because it resolves the internal problems in the Labour party, with some members set against further devolution and some wanting much more.

Adam Price: I wish to return to the internal problems in the Conservative party. If the Order in Council procedure is such anathema to the Conservative party, why, on 25 January in the Assembly Committee considering the Bill, did the leader of the Welsh Conservative party ask for more subject areas to be added to schedule 5?

Mr. Grieve: Schedule 5 defines the powers that could be given to the Welsh Assembly under part 3 or part 4. I do not see a problem with those of my colleagues in the Welsh Assembly who say that they would like more devolved powers for Wales. The question is how those powers should be devolved. It seems to me to be a fairly simple matter.

Mr. Gummer: If I sat in the Welsh Assembly, I would want the schedule to include several powers that it does not include at present, but I would expect that—in order to press for part 4 to be enacted—the people of Wales could make that judgment. The argument advanced by the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price), with whom I often agree, misses the point. If one wants greater devolved powers, this is the only way to achieve that under the format presented by the Government.

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. Friend makes a good point. To return to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) about whether such powers could be used more extensively in England, the answer must be yes. Indeed, the whole constitutional trend since Labour came into power in 1997 is to minimise the use of Parliament for governmental business. The Government go to considerable lengths to avoid having legislation scrutinised in this place. When it is scrutinised in this place, the guillotining of business means that we cannot give it adequate scrutiny. One of the real ironies—I regard it as a disgrace—is that the Government, having preventing us from scrutinising legislation properly, claim that as Parliament cannot do the job they might as well give it to someone else. That is a pattern of behaviour from this Government.

The House should not subscribe to part 3, unless the Government choose to have a referendum on it and allow the Welsh people to understand what it is all about. That is what we try to achieve in new clause 1.

Mr. David Jones: If the Government were to be minded to offer such a referendum, would it not be just as easy for them to offer one on part 4 at this stage and forget part 3?

Mr. Grieve: It would be and, from a constitutional point of view, part 4 would be a much better option than part 3. If someone offered me a choice between part 3 and part 4, I would choose part 4. Although it is a major constitutional change, part 4 at least has some internal coherence, which part 3 lacks. I accept that it is possible that the Welsh people, if they were to be consulted, might decide that they wished to be governed by Order in Council under the part 3 procedure. If that choice were put to them, I would enjoy campaigning in Wales and explaining to people what part 3 is all about. If the Government think that part 3 is such an attractive proposal, they should accept new clause 1, and I hope to hear the Minister say so before the end of the debate. If new clause 1 is accepted, we will see the same spirit of concord that we saw when the Government accepted an amendment tabled by Labour Back Benchers a few moments ago.

New clause 3 is a fall-back position. Inadequate as part 3 is, new clause 3 would provide a system for a Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament and the Assembly to scrutinise draft orders. That would go some way to remedying the democratic deficit of part 3. Amendment No. 7 is consequential to amendment No. 4.

Our view is straightforward. Further devolution can work only if it is honest in empowering the legislature rather than favouring the Executive. Part 3 is a bureaucrat's charter. It is also a charter that suits Government very well, and hundreds of years of acquired rights, which are enshrined in legislatures, are being systematically eroded by the drafting of part 3. The House should have nothing to do with it. It is unworthy of the Government to propose it. Despite having sat through Committee and debated the Bill extensively during its passage, I did not understand a point that the Minister made today. If, however, it is true that Parliament will have only the vaguest notion of the detail of what the Assembly will enact, that is an even more compelling reason why part 3 should be rejected. Part 3 is the creature of the Executive and I hope that the House will send out a signal that some of us, at least, will not accept that principle.

Ian Lucas: What we have just heard is a gross misrepresentation of the system that is proposed and betrays a profound lack of understanding of the legislative system that has been in operation, certainly since I came to this place in 2001. That is perhaps not surprising from the Conservatives, because they have limited experience of legislation affecting Wales during that period. In reality, that legislation has been subject to unprecedented scrutiny, because of the emergence of pre-legislative scrutiny. I suggested as much to the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) during earlier proceedings on the Bill, but he does not seem to have taken it on board.

Pre-legislative scrutiny was instituted under the Conservative Government before 1997 and has developed substantially since then, especially since 2001 in respect of Wales. Proposals from the Assembly have been scrutinised by Committees of the House, primarily the Welsh Affairs Committee. They have been almost scrutinised to death. In at least two cases, the Public Audit (Wales) Bill and the Transport (Wales) Bill, the pre-legislative scrutiny of the Welsh Affairs Committee—often working with the Assembly—meant that no substantial amendments were needed when the measures came before the House. Bills have avoided taking up unnecessary Chamber time due to the extent of the pre-legislative scrutiny. No amendments were tabled in the House and Bills went through without difficulty.

As pre-legislative scrutiny will apply to the process outlined in the Bill, I cannot for the life of me understand why it is regarded as so heinous. The Conservatives often seem to believe in a Whig concept of constitutional history wherein legislative processes in the Chamber reached a state of grace in 1997, such that no constitutional improvement could be possible after that date and that any proposal made since then has been a usurpation of the powers of the general populace—powers that the Government are determined to take from them.

Mr. Grieve: I certainly do not suggest that the problems date only from 1997—some of them predate 1997. I want to pick the hon. Gentleman up on one point. He talks about pre-legislative scrutiny, but of what—the Order in Council or the draft measure? That was the point I made to the Minister, who in Committee made a considerable error that he subsequently had to correct by writing to people. He said that "the preliminary draft measure, along with its explanatory memorandum, will be attached. It will therefore, going through its pre-legislative scrutiny, be amendable".—[Official Report, 9 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 121.]

He had to withdraw those comments, but I did not understand from them that we would not see the preliminary draft measure; yet I understand from what he said earlier today that we shall not see it, so how can we even consider, in pre-legislative scrutiny terms, what the measure will be?

Ian Lucas: The Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but my understanding is that the preliminary draft measure will be given pre-legislative scrutiny, which will be amendable. There is no suggestion that Members will not have the opportunity to consider proposals. They will be considered by the House and by Assembly Members, probably in a joint legislative Committee of the Assembly and Parliament.

Mr. David Jones: Is not the hon. Gentleman falling into the trap of thinking that each Order in Council is a one-off? In fact, each Order in Council will devolve primary competence, for a particular matter in a particular field, to the Assembly. The Assembly can then, if it wants, revisit that devolved competence and create further Assembly Measures, which will never be subject to pre-legislative scrutiny by the House.

Nick Ainger: That is devolution.

Mr. Jones: Precisely, but the hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) seems to think that pre-legislative scrutiny will apply to every proposed Assembly Measure, when clearly it will not.

6.15 pm

Ian Lucas: Since the Government of Wales Act 1998, devolution of further powers has occurred regularly, as anyone familiar with the development of devolution must be aware, and we have not needed a referendum at every stage of that process. Indeed, until our debates on the Bill, I had never heard a suggestion that a referendum was needed every time a power was transferred to the Assembly. The process has been continuous, but the Conservatives do not seem to recognise the dynamic of devolution and the joint relationship that has developed between the Assembly and Parliament.

Mr. Grieve: There is a slight difference between transferring further functions to the Assembly to operate under the existing devolution settlement and creating a new devolution settlement subject to the powers in part 3. The hon. Gentleman has a legal background and I am sure that if he gave even a moment's thought to the difference between the procedures in part 3 and the existing situation, he would acknowledge that point.

Ian Lucas: Of course there will be a change in the process, but as I pointed out earlier the reason for it is that the existing process leads to the House considering legislation unnecessarily, because it has already been scrutinised. The Conservatives are grasping at straws when they suggest that we are engaged in some perverted constitutional exercise that undermines fundamental liberties. The Government have a proud record on developing pre-legislative scrutiny, recognising the existence of the Assembly and facilitating working relationships between it and the Westminster Parliament that have led to an improvement in the scrutiny of legislation affecting Wales. Far from undermining those relationships, the measure will improve them.

Mr. Gummer: It would be foolish to ignore the background to this part of the Bill. Clearly, some Government Members want no further devolution. For them, even the description of continuing devolution given by the hon. Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas) would be anathema. It is pleasing that the Father of the House is not in the Chamber, for he would have been very unhappy had he heard that.

Other Labour Members want more devolution. Both views are perfectly reasonable. Indeed, one might find a range of views about devolution among Opposition Members—whether there is enough or whether it should go further. What is unacceptable is to try to paper over those cracks in a way that strikes at the very heart of the activity of Parliament. That brings me to a direct argument with the hon. Member for Wrexham, but I hope that he will acquit me of anything other than real concern for parliamentary democracy.

I admit that I would have liked a different way of sharing power in the United Kingdom from that decided on in 1997 and thereafter. However, having undertaken it as we have, it is unacceptable that the people of Wales should have a form of devolution significantly different from that provided for the people of Scotland. Were there an opportunity for a referendum, I hope that the people of Wales would vote for greater devolution, much along the lines of that accorded to people in Scotland.

What seems unacceptable is to say that, because the majority party does not believe that it could achieve a common view, it will offer the people of Wales what is in part 3 instead of what is essentially in part 4, but that, of course, they must not have a vote on it, because if they did, they might recognise just how silly it is—silly in the sense that this is a means whereby the future of the people of Wales is removed from the parliamentary hands in which it is now and from any referendum and placed in the hands of bureaucrats and Ministers.

The problem for the Government is that all the parallels to this are unflattering; they happen in circumstances where dictatorial Governments, very often monarchical in kind, wanted to have a parliamentary structure that discussed things, argued things, scrutinised things, but did not actually decide things. The trouble for any of us who take an interest in 19th century history is that the Minister's explanation sounds closer to those of Louis Napoleon—[Interruption.] It is all right for the hon. Member for Vale of Clwyd (Chris Ruane), but I hoped that he would have read up about Louis Napoleon, because he would have found out just how parallel the proposal is.

As my Welsh nationalist friends know, I am in no way unsupportive of many of the positions that they take, but I am disappointed that both they and the Liberals have fallen for the significantly dangerous sleight of hand that the Conservative party is trying to remove under the amendment. I am not trying to remove it to reduce the Welsh Assembly's powers. I want to remove it so that we can move on to offer to the Welsh Assembly greater powers through the referendum, which would do so publicly and clearly, and I would be happy to debate with the Father of the House the advantages of going further, while he would no doubt explain the advantage of going backwards, which is, of course, the usual direction of his party.

Lembit Öpik: Although the right hon. Gentleman may indeed be Suffolk, Coastal's first Welsh nationalist, can he nevertheless not grasp the scepticism that some of us feel about his claimed embracement of the devolution project, given that other Conservative Members have made it clear in the debate that they do not support the devolution of further powers? In addition, there is an absolute mess of policy confusion between what Nick Bourne says for the Conservatives in Cardiff and what right hon. and hon. Members say regarding Conservative policy in Westminster.

Mr. Gummer: Subtlety never was a great Liberal virtue, but let me try to explain what is a very clear subtlety in this matter. It should not matter to the hon. Gentleman that Conservative Members will have different views on devolution; what should matter to him is whether the people of Wales will be given an opportunity to decide what they think about devolution. He is a Liberal—and this is the point of my speech with which the hon. Member for Vale of Clwyd can agree—and, in reality, Liberals are always illiberal. When people ask them, "Are you going to stand up for democracy, choice and people deciding?" "Oh, no," they say, "much better to let the Government do it, because we might then get a bit, and we might not have to face the electorate to argue the case." It is very interesting: scratch a Liberal and we always find a fascist. That is absolutely true, universally.

Lembit Öpik rose—

Mr. Gummer: It is no good saying that I have used an unsuitable word. I mean it in the precise terms of people who believe that the state is right and that the state system should overcome the realities of democracy. The trouble is that the provision proposes the use of Orders in Council—the very phrase is one of those that means something horrific. It means that the Government and Ministers use a technique that specifically makes democratic control as febrile and slim as is humanly possible in a House that calls itself a Parliament. It is a carefully contrived method of making it almost impossible for anyone to disagree. If that is not the mechanism of Napoleon III and his successors, I really do ask what would be.

Lembit Öpik rose—

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): Lembit III.

Lembit Öpik: Lembit I. Aside from the somewhat distasteful language that the right hon. Gentleman has uncharacteristically used in his contribution, may I remind him which Government most promoted the use of Orders in Council in the House? Was it not the Conservatives in their 18 years in government who set the precedent for using Orders in Council to govern this country much more than any Government beforehand? Therefore, is he willing to condemn the very Government of whom he was a part?

Mr. Gummer: If that were true—

Lembit Öpik: It is true.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman should listen to the end of my sentence. If that were true, it is also true that a further and extraordinary extension of that has been done by the Government and is being proposed now. If I were to decide to discuss all the Orders in Council in the past with the hon. Gentleman, you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, would soon stop me, so I will concentrate on the Orders in Council as dealt with in the amendment. I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that it does not help in a logical argument to say, "Because you did it, he can do it." I am arguing something quite different.

Let us not become caught up in what the Liberals say is distasteful. If what I said was in any way distasteful, of course I withdraw any lack of taste in the sentence, but I think that the hon. Gentleman knows precisely what I mean. Liberals are illiberal when it comes to the promotion of their own views. They are thoroughly illiberal, and they would prefer the Government to impose such things than to give the public the chance to choose them. That is the fundamental issue. We are talking about something much more important than merely the way in which Orders in Council will be discussed.

David T.C. Davies: Does my right hon. Friend agree that both the Labour party and the Conservative party in government have taken various steps to support a decentralisation of powers, either through the Wales Office or the Welsh Assembly, about which I am less enthusiastic, whereas the Liberal party, which has always claimed to be the party of devolution, had a perfect opportunity to introduce home rule when it was last in government and chose not to do so?

Mr. Gummer: The great point that my hon. Friend makes is clear: Liberals in power prefer to keep hold of that power and use it in the way that they want, rather than sharing it. It is only when they are out of power that they are keen on the sharing bit. It is a serious issue to find the Liberal party on the side of the proposal, but I would expect that from it. I am much more unhappy about the Welsh nationalists, because the word "principle" means something to Welsh nationalists, and it therefore distinguishes them from my experience of the Liberal party. I always remember the person on the doorstep who told me—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh, come on."] Labour Members will like this if they wait a moment—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. What is more important in this matter is whether the occupant of the Chair likes it, and we are now getting a little wide of the mark. The right hon. Gentleman ought to draw himself back to the amendment.

Mr. Gummer: I will certainly do that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, although I had hoped to give you a moment of amusement in what might otherwise be a long debate on detail.

If we now take the principle, being obnoxious, that the Government should arrogate to themselves powers that should be properly in the hands of a democratic Assembly, we should ask ourselves which democratic Assembly should have those powers. It seems to me that that is what the amendment deals with. It would mean that if there were to be devolution, it would have to take place in two ways: Parliament would have to decide to offer it and the people of Wales, in this case, would have to decide through a referendum that they wanted it. The Government wish to avoid both those principles. They do not want Parliament properly to scrutinise each item of devolution. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said earlier, such items are part of a group, rather than a series of single items. The Government do not want this Parliament to make those decisions, nor do they want them to be offered to the people of Wales.

6.30 pm

My hon. Friend, with typical generosity, suggested that it would be valuable to put part 3 to a referendum. If the Government offered to do that, I understand that we would be prepared to withdraw amendment No. 4, because it would then be possible for the people of Wales to say what they thought of this political stitch-up. It would also be possible for us to flush out the varying attitudes to this proposal in the governing party. However, when the referendum was proposed, there was, if I may say so delicately—I hope that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who asserted that he was not keen on my language, does not mind the word that I am about to use—a certain amount of tittering. We imagined going round Wales saying, "Would you like the Government to have a power of Orders in Council in order to be able to present things that you ought to be able to decide on?" I can imagine the enthusiasm with which people would rush out to vote on such a proposal. The tittering came from not only this side of the House. One or two Labour Members—and there are only one or two in the Chamber—managed, rather ineffectively, to cover up their tittering.

The question is more serious than was supposed. The people of Wales are not being offered a referendum on part 3 because the Government know, first, that they would be held up to ridicule and, secondly, that the people of Wales would say no. They would say no on one of two grounds: either because they wanted proper devolution, which is why I would say no, or because they thought that they did not want any more devolution, which is what some of my colleagues might think. They would certainly accept that this part of the Bill is a palpable ruse. It is a fake and a fraud, and not a proper thing to bring in front of the House. That is why the Opposition propose its removal. We are democrats and we want Parliament, whether it is the UK Parliament, the Welsh Assembly, or, indeed, the Scottish Parliament, to make decisions democratically.

My difficulty is that the Minister has been put in an impossible position because he does not really believe what he is saying. I know that because he is a very good arguer on most things. He is clear, concise, comprehensible and comprehensive. On this matter, he has been opaque, long-winded, imprecise and, if I may say so, incomprehensible. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield is a man whose mind is sharp and who seizes the point rapidly. The fact that he got to this point in the debate before he understood what the Government were about is a comment not on his intelligence, but on the Government's imprecision and, I think, their lack of knowledge of their own proposals.

I do not think that you were in the Chair at the time, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but, interestingly, there was a point at which Members on the Government Front Bench and the Benches behind were busy trying to discuss what the Government's policy actually was. It was clear that the hon. Member for Wrexham put things in a way that did not quite fit what the Minister thought he had been saying. It certainly did not quite fit what we thought the Minister had been saying. If one has been around as long as I have, one begins to get suspicious when a Minister is imprecise, unclear and unable to communicate a key part of a Bill—the part that amendment No. 4 would remove. One begins to wonder whether there is something up and whether things are not quite as they seem—of course, they are not at all as they seem.

Right the way through the debate, the House has been told that we are creating a system that will enable the Welsh Assembly to get more legislation through more rapidly and more sensibly, in terms that are denied it because of the heavy burden on this House. That would sound all right if it were not for the fact that the important necessary phrase, "and therefore the Government have decided to take things into their own hands," is missing from that statement. The Government have decided that they will invent a system that ensures that control is no longer in the hands of this democratic Parliament. However, it will be put not into the hands of the democratic Assembly, but, in fact, into the Government's hands. That must be wrong for everyone, but because the matter does not have to be put to a referendum, the cracks between the various and interestingly different views of members of the Labour party can be papered over. That is why I come back to wooing the Welsh nationalists.

The Welsh nationalists know perfectly well what the Government are about. When it comes to an election, they will say that the provisions are about avoiding the fundamental question of whether the Assembly is going to be a Parliament or not. If the Welsh nationalists were true to their principles, they would say, "Look here, we are not going to provide the cover for this. We are not going to stand in front of the Government and pretend that this is another step on the way to devolution. Instead, we are going to stand up and tell the Government to give us part 4. We will fight them on the doorsteps and make sure that we win a referendum. Give us part 4 and do not palm us off with part 3." That is the heart of the opposition that is summed up in amendment No. 4.

I, who have gone into the Lobbies with my Welsh nationalist friends, sometimes against a Whip, ask them to think seriously about what their position will do to them in the Principality. It will enable people to say very simply, "These are people who are more interested in supporting a bureaucratic fudge than standing for the central issue of democratic control over the future of the people of Wales." In the past, there were better ways of doing things than the way that we ended up with, but, having got where we have, let us not allow ourselves to be led down the dangerous path that the Government have proposed.

If we do not agree to the amendment, we will set a precedent that could be used much more widely. Mr. Deputy Speaker, you have not sat through every hour of the debate on the Bill—although it may have seemed like it from time to time—but it is right that the important subject of Welsh Government matters and the Principality should have occupied so much of our time. Those of us who live in the county of Suffolk—one of the six counties that, for the purpose of administrative regions, the Government call the east of England—note that we have not been given the equivalent time to discuss forced regionalisation, which we do not want and which involves the transfer of powers relating to our police, ambulances and hospitals to a central body in a region. We are concerned that the pattern evident here, a point that my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Daniel Kawczynski) rightly raised, will enable the Government to say, "If this is how we do it for Wales, why don't we do it for the non-existent region of the east of England? There is a lot of business in Parliament. Why don't we bypass the people of that region, just as we have bypassed the people of Wales?".

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield has to accept that I speak on his side on this occasion not only because I think that we should stand up for the ability of a different part of the United Kingdom to govern itself in a more effective and direct way than the bureaucratic answer being presented by the Minister, but because those of us who are being threatened by another bureaucratic nightmare called regionalisation see in this clause a means of removing from us the right to make decisions through local government that we have at the moment.

As my hon. Friend says, we tabled the amendment because we need to stand against something that is at the heart of this Government's activity—constantly emasculating the House of Commons, removing from us our powers of control and not allowing us to devolve those powers as we think fit subject to a referendum of the people of that area. If, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you feel that I am moving away from the amendment, I remind you that it would remove from the Bill the very trick that could be used to get round the problem that this Government cannot win a referendum in England either. Why on earth are they not offering a referendum to the people of Wales? I will tell you, Mr. Deputy Speaker—it is because they know very well that they would lose it, and this Government have referendums only if they think that they can win them.

We want to get rid of part 3 altogether, but I would hope that the Government, in answering, would offer something in its place. I am sure that the real answer is for us to withdraw our amendment and allow the Government to move forward to a referendum on either part 3 or part 4. I suggest that it should be on part 4, and I hope in that case that I would find myself campaigning in the more pleasant company of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Hywel Williams) rather than that of the Father of the House.

At least we would be arguing about reality, democracy, clarity, transparency and consistency. At this moment, we are offered something that is opaque, inconsistent, unclear and fundamentally dishonest. It is for that reason that I am pleased that this party has insisted that we stand up for democracy and against the growing bureaucratisation of our society, led by a Government who are frightened of Parliament, which is best illustrated by the fact that they have a Prime Minister with the worst record of coming here of any Prime Minister since we first started.

Jenny Willott (Cardiff, Central) (LD): I would like to speak to amendments Nos. 59 to 61. It seems a long time since we started debating this group of amendments and I shall endeavour to be brief.

The amendments would restrict the ability of the Secretary of State to derail the Welsh Assembly's wishes. They would remove the power to refuse to lay a draft order before the House and prevent unnecessary delay by requiring the Secretary of State to act within 30 days, rather than the 60 days currently stated in the Bill. Given that any Assembly Measures or draft orders have already been debated and agreed in the Assembly, there appears to be no need for further delay at this end. Liberal Democrats believe that the whole point of devolution is to let the people of Wales have their views represented, and it would completely undermine that principle if the democratic will of the Assembly were allowed to be delayed or completely stymied by the will of one individual in the person of the Secretary of State for Wales.

6.45 pm

Lembit Öpik: My hon. Friend will, like me, expect the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) to vote for that change because he has made it very clear that he would support any opportunity to increase democratic accountability in the system. Obviously, then, he would agree with my hon. Friend's argument that the will of the Assembly is clearly a more democratic guide to the interests of Wales than one appointed Secretary of State for Wales.

Jenny Willott: Not surprisingly, I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Grieve: I would be grateful if, in the course of her remarks, the hon. Lady spoke to amendment No. 59 in her name and those of her hon. Friends. I am sympathetic to the idea of preventing the Secretary of State from derailing the process, but the impact of that amendment, if I understand it correctly, appears to be to remove the need for there to be a resolution of this House at all.

Jenny Willott: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the Liberal Democrats believe in a full Welsh Parliament, so ideally we would like the democratic will of the Welsh people to be expressed in such a Parliament. However, the amendments are about ensuring that, in the orders that come through this Parliament, the will of the Assembly cannot be derailed.

Mr. Grieve: Will the hon. Lady give way again?

Jenny Willott: I would rather not. This debate has gone on for a long time and it is important that we move on, or many issues will not be covered.

Unfortunately, we cannot support the Tory amendments in this group. Although we do not agree with all of the Bill, as we have made clear a number of times during the debates, we believe in devolution and would like the Assembly to have further powers. The Conservatives' amendments would slow up the process and cause unnecessary delays that would undermine the view of the Assembly; therefore we cannot support them.

Mr. David Jones: The hon. Lady talks in terms of delay, but could not delay be avoided altogether if we deleted part 3 and proceeded immediately to part 4?

Jenny Willott: I point out that the hon. Gentleman's own party does not necessarily agree with that. We have made our view clear throughout.

Depending on the Minister's response, we may want to press amendment No. 60 to a vote.

Mr. David Jones: I rise to support wholeheartedly the amendment that stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve). Part 3 goes to the heart of what I consider to be a most reprehensible and devious piece of legislation proposed by this Government.

The Government seek to portray part 3 as an innocuous measure aimed at modestly increasing or, if you like, streamlining the powers of the Assembly. Were that the case I have no doubt that neither I nor my right hon. and hon. Friends would have any problems with it and we would not be taking up the time of the House. The Assembly is now a fact of life in Wales. It may not yet be working entirely satisfactorily but it is part of the fabric of government in Wales and we all have a duty to make it work as best it can. However, part 3 is not a modest measure. It is a measure aimed at conferring primary legislative competence on the Assembly on a piecemeal basis. It is therefore, by any measure, a major constitutional innovation which, if enacted, will transfer a significant degree of legislative competence from this place to another legislative body.

[Mr. David Jones]

The fact that such transfer is, as I say, on a piecemeal basis through Orders in Council does not render it any less significant. The fact is that, over time, more and more primary powers will be ceded by Parliament to the Assembly, subject of course always to the executive filtration process of the Secretary of State, which, like my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield, I find particularly repugnant.

It is generally agreed that the convention that has developed in this country is that if primary powers are ceded by Parliament to another body, a referendum should first take place in which the will of the people is consulted. That is what happened in Wales in 1997; that is what should happen now. The Government know that. Part 4 provides that such a referendum must take place before Assembly Acts may be passed, but Assembly Measures will be no less primary legislation, so the question is: why will the Government not give the people of Wales the simple right to vote on the proposals in a referendum? The answer is simple: they know that they would lose.

The Secretary of State has already acknowledged that there is no consensus in Wales for more primary powers for the Assembly. On 15 June last year, he said:

"we will call a referendum only if there is a consensus for one. There is no consensus for one now, and it would be lost."—[Official Report, 15 June 2005; Vol. 435, c. 266.]

and recently the right hon. Gentleman said that neither he nor the Welsh First Minister was "in the business of calling referendums we are going to lose."

That is all well and good, but if the Secretary of State fears that the people of Wales would vote against the transfer of primary powers to the Assembly, why is he so insistent on inflicting those powers on the people of Wales, whether or not they want them?

The suspicion must be—I hope that it is not unfair—that some internal Labour party tension is prompting the proposals in part 3, which enable the transfer of powers to the Assembly while preserving the illusion of power remaining at Westminster, whereas, in fact, the power remains in the hands of the Secretary of State for Wales. The fact that the proposals constitute such a device was acknowledged by Lord Richard when he gave evidence to the Welsh Affairs Committee. What he said has been quoted before, but it deserves to be quoted again. He said:

"Let's be frank about it, it is a device to avoid having to come to Westminster and ask for primary powers to be formally devolved. It is quite an interesting device. . . . Westminster can say they have not devolved primary legislative powers, but depending on the way in which the Order in Council procedure is used, it could in effect be a concealed grant of almost a direct legislative competence down to Cardiff."

In fact, it is more than almost; it is the transfer of a direct legislative competence to Cardiff without first consulting the people of Wales in a referendum.

That is reprehensible, and made all the more so by the fact that control of the whole procedure resides in the Executive and not in this House. The Minister shakes his head, but it is true: control rests with the Secretary of State for Wales, not with this House. The proposals represent a fraud on the people of Wales and the electorate of the entire United Kingdom. If the people of Wales are to have more devolution—not an ignoble aspiration on the part of those who want it—we should be entirely satisfied that that is what they want. Part 3 is wholly unnecessary; it is in the Bill purely and simply to serve the internal interests of the Labour party.

I say that we should proceed immediately to part 4 and consult the people of Wales now, through a referendum, on whether they do indeed want more legislative competence to be handed down to Cardiff. If so, we must abide by their decision and hand over that power. If not, we must equally respect their decision. The proposal is a three-card trick—an absolute disgrace to the Labour party. Perhaps the absence of Labour Members indicates the shame that they feel. What is proposed is an illegitimate exercise—an attempt to usurp the powers of this place. It is wholly reprehensible and the amendment should be supported.

Nick Ainger: Well, we have gone over the same old ground as we did in Committee. Let me put on the record what is, in fact, proposed in part 3, and not the fantasy outlined by Conservative Members. The purpose of part 3 is to provide the Assembly with a streamlined procedure to achieve its legislative priorities. It builds on the existing devolution settlement, giving the Assembly greater scope to determine the detail of Welsh legislation, but with Parliament remaining in overall control through the Order in Council process. It will enable the Assembly to break free from the Westminster logjam without fundamentally altering the devolution settlement. That was approved by the referendum in 1997.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister repeats what he said on Second Reading—that there is a legislative logjam—but we established in Committee that there is no legislative logjam. Why should we take seriously what he has to say when, in fact, he is merely repeating verbatim what he said on Second Reading and not engaging in debate at all.

Nick Ainger: It is not surprising that I repeat what I said verbatim: the hon. Gentleman made the same points on Second Reading and I am merely responding to them.

The hon. Gentleman claims that there is no legislative logjam, but of course there is. The Welsh Assembly cannot get legislation on the statute book as quickly as it would like to. The Bill proposes a way to deal with that problem.

Everyone agrees that the split between the legislature and the Executive needs to be established, but if amendment No. 4 were passed, it would result in the absurdity of a legislature without any legislative powers. The Assembly might have to wait many years to acquire primary powers in a referendum; in the meantime, Wales would be wholly dependent on primary legislation passed at Westminster, which would have to compete for time with UK Government priorities.

Mr. David Jones: The Minister suggests that there would be a delay of years, but why should there be any delay at all? Why do the Government not simply proceed immediately to a referendum under part 4? Is it because they know that they would lose it?

Nick Ainger: As we have debated on many occasions and as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has explained several times, the Labour party's view is that if a referendum on any particular issue were held now, there would be no guarantee that it would be won. That would deal a fundamental blow to the confidence and reputation of the Assembly. We have put part 4 in the Bill so that, in the future, when a two-thirds majority in the Assembly deem that the time is right for a referendum and that there is a consensus in Wales in favour of moving forward to full primary powers, a referendum will be held. At present, the judgment is that now is not the time.

David T.C. Davies: The Minister said that the Government would not hold a referendum because there is no guarantee that they will win it. Does not that underline the point that we have been trying to make, which is that the Government have got into the habit of holding referendums only when they feel that they can win them, whereas we believe in holding referendums to allow people to have their say?

Nick Ainger: I am trying to remember how many referendums were held in 18 years of Tory rule. The answer is: not one. I will take no lectures from the hon. Gentleman about referendums. His argument is bizarre. The purpose of referendums is to establish people's view on a change.

It is pointless to hold a referendum if one knows that one is not going to achieve the change that is its purpose. [Interruption.] I am not going to take any lectures from the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who was a member of the Cabinet for many of the 18 years in which the Conservatives were in government. During that period, not one referendum was held.

The procedure set out in part 3 will enable the Assembly to deal in a more timely way with legislation to deliver manifesto commitments made by Welsh Ministers, and will prevent the need to secure slots for Wales-only Bills or to rely on suitable England and Wales Bills being introduced at the right time.

Turning to Conservative new clause 1, which is the same as new clause 6, which was debated and rejected in Committee, the proposal to hold a referendum before the relevant part of the Bill can come into effect is unnecessary. There was a clear commitment in the Labour manifesto at the general election in May 2005 to "legislate for a stronger Assembly with enhanced legislative powers".

The Government were elected on that manifesto. It is argued that the proposals were not set out in detail for the electorate, but the electorate knows that once a Government are formed their job is to introduce detailed proposals, and that is what we did in the White Paper published in June last year. There was not a single response among the 81 responses received to suggest that a referendum was required before the Assembly could be granted power to make Assembly Measures on matters on which Parliament had given it legislative competence. Those powers are an adaptation of the current settlement, not a fundamental change, and they are not the same as giving the Assembly primary powers.

Part 3 does not give the Assembly any new powers to legislate on devolved subjects, but it provides a new procedure for Parliament to grant such powers. It is extraordinary that the Opposition should want Parliament to hold an expensive referendum to seek permission to change our own procedures. Parliament will be able to scrutinise and control on a case-by-case basis the draft Orders in Council that confer those legislative powers on the Assembly. It will rightly be for the Assembly to scrutinise the way in which its legislative competence is used to enact Assembly Measures that address the needs of Wales. Since 1999, Parliament has passed legislation that gives the Assembly powers to make its own provisions for Wales. Increasingly, Parliament has been willing to give the Assembly broad powers to legislate in Wales-only clauses in England and Wales Bills. The proposed system develops that approach. Parliament still has control of the process, as legislative competence cannot be conferred on the Assembly unless both Houses of Parliament have agreed to do so. It is essential that part 3 should be in place from the outset. It is essential, too, that the Assembly should have the ability to seek legislative competence on its own initiative.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister says that it is essential that part 3 should be in place, yet only a few moments ago, he acknowledged that part 4 probably could not be implemented because the people of Wales did not want it. Why does he think that part 3 is desired by the people of Wales?

Nick Ainger: Because they voted for a Labour Government and a Labour manifesto.

Amendment No. 5, which was tabled by the Conservatives, deals with Assembly resolutions to ask Parliament to pass legislation on devolved matters, but it would not change the legal effect of the Bill. There is nothing in the Bill to prevent the Assembly from making such a resolution. While Parliament passes legislation, it is for Government to introduce it, so the Government's role could not be circumvented and the amendment is not required. In addition, I remind Members of the provision in clause 33 whereby the Secretary of State is required to consult the Assembly about the Government's legislative programme. The Assembly can use the consultation to ensure that the Secretary of State is aware of matters that it wishes to be dealt with in primary legislation affecting Wales, whether or not the Assembly has competence to make Assembly Measures on those matters. There is therefore no need for the amendment.

Turning to new clause 3, I have made it clear throughout the progress of the Bill that pre-legislative scrutiny of proposed Orders in Council under clause 94 should be at the discretion of Members of Parliament and of Assembly Members. It is worth maintaining flexibility, rather than specifying requirements for joint scrutiny in the Bill. It is worth noting, too, that the House of Commons already makes provision for the Welsh Affairs Committee to undertake joint inquiries with Assembly Committees under Standing Orders Nos. 137A(1)(a) and 137A(3). That arrangement has led to successful pre-legislative scrutiny of a number of Wales-only Bills, so we do not require any further legislation. The right way forward is to allow Parliament to work with the Assembly to develop that successful model further, rather than establish over-prescriptive requirements in legislation. The way in which pre-legislative scrutiny is carried out is usually left to Parliament to decide, rather than being specified in legislation. Standing Orders, not legislation, are the appropriate means of dealing with that.

Amendment No. 7, which was tabled by the Conservatives, would prevent Orders in Council that amend schedule 5 from being made before the Assembly election in 2007. The Bill provides for the early commencement of clauses 94 and 95 so that clarifying amendments can be made to schedule 5 before general commencement, should that prove necessary. For example, if one of the descriptions of fields or matters in schedule 5 is found to be insufficiently clear, an Order in Council under clause 94 could be proposed to clarify the extent of the field or matter. I am quite happy to place on record the fact that it is not intended that such Orders in Council should be used to confer wholly new legislative competence on the Assembly in advance of general commencement of the Bill following the 2007 election. Although the Bill provides that sections 94 and 95 will come into force on the day on which it is enacted, in fact, we would not carry out any functions under those sections for a period of two months following Royal Assent.

Under amendments Nos. 59 to 61, which were tabled by the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Jenny Willott), Parliament cannot be written out of the process of approving draft Orders in Council. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) was quite right—the amendments would mean that there would be no parliamentary scrutiny of Orders in Council. It is not acceptable for the Assembly to vote itself additional powers. It is for Parliament to decide whether it is appropriate to confer legislative competence on the Assembly. Parliament has the right to legislate in relation to Wales, so it has the right to decide whether to allow another legislature to do so.

Amendments Nos. 60 and 61 would leave the Secretary of State with a vestigial role in the process. He or she would receive notice of a draft Order in Council approved by the Assembly, but he or she could do no more than sit on it for up to 30 days before having to return it to the Clerk of the Assembly, who would submit the draft Order for approval by Her Majesty in Council. There would not be any scrutiny by Parliament. The amendments illustrate the dangers of starting to unpick the Bill's provisions. If the Assembly could give itself legislative competence, what opportunity would there be to challenge it? I assume that the 30 day-provision is designed to cater for that, but it is a most unsatisfactory way of tackling the issue. I therefore urge hon. Members who have tabled amendments in this group not to press them any further.

Mr. Grieve: I suspect that the Minister and I agree on one thing—amendment No. 59 encapsulates the criticism that my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) made of the Liberal Democrats. When faced with a difficult choice, they decided that the best way to proceed was to eliminate all form of democratic scrutiny from the legislation to enable the Secretary of State to have a free hand with the Assembly without any intervention from Parliament in part 3. I do not know whether they intend to press their amendment to a vote, but I wish to concentrate on amendment No. 4.

The Minister has been wholly unpersuasive on the matter. One of the most telling comments that we have heard during the debate was the confession made for the first time by the Government that they considered that part 4 would not pass a referendum in Wales. Regrettable though that might be to my right hon. Friend and others, it highlights the absurdity of the Government proceeding by means of part 3. The justification offered to the House was that the Assembly would otherwise wither on the vine, whereas in fact it can have a perfectly respectable and separate existence implementing secondary legislation, if that is what the people of Wales want. There is no reason why the Executive cannot be split from the Legislature in order to improve that, which is why we supported the part of the Bill which does exactly that.

Our position is that in the absence of an assurance from the Government that there would be a referendum on the implementation of part 3, the only proper course of action is to remove part 3 from the Bill entirely. The people of Wales will lose nothing thereby. Part 4 offers them real change if they want it. The other parts of the Bill, particularly the splitting of the Assembly and the Legislature, offer them a new format for governance along current lines, if that is what they want. Part 3 should have no place in the Bill, and I urge every hon. Member in the House to support us in opposing it. If we do not succeed in removing part 3, I hope at the appropriate moment later this evening to press new clause 1 to the vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 133, Noes 337.

New Clause 2

REFERENDUM NOT TO BE HELD MORE THAN TEN YEARS AFTER PASSING OF ACT

'No Order in Council under section 102(1) may be made after the expiration of the period of ten years after the passing of this Act.'. —[David Mundell.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

David Mundell: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss new clause 13—Interval between referendums—

'No Order in Council under section 102 (1) (other than the first such Order in Council) may be made until four years have elapsed after the referendum held by virtue of the previous Order in Council under subsection (1).'.

David Mundell: During our debates on the preceding amendments, it was said that, if a referendum were held, it would be lost and that the Government therefore did not plan to hold one. However, the Bill places no time limit on holding such a referendum. Although the Secretary of State said that he intended the measure to settle the constitutional situation in Wales for a generation, it cannot be right that there is no end position about holding a referendum. Foresight in government and in legislation is always important, but we could be legislating for something that took place in 20 or 30 years, when it could not be described as depending on specific circumstances. That is inappropriate and it is why we have tabled the new clause.

The new clause clearly provides that if a referendum on giving the National Assembly full law-making powers such as those set out in part 4 had not been held after 10 years, fresh legislation would be required. There is good reason for that. We are legislating on the basis of a referendum that we are already told would be lost. There is no logic in requiring that to happen in 15, 20 or more years.

[David Mundell]

The Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary conceded that a referendum would be lost. The Secretary of State said that he did not anticipate holding a referendum for the rest of the decade. We therefore propose 10 years as a reasonable period in which to allow a referendum to take place. It is not unreasonable to ask Parliament to reconsider the matter if a referendum has not happened in 10 years. If the Secretary of State and the Government are sincere about presenting the argument to persuade the people of Wales to take forward, through the Assembly, the powers in part 4, they could do that, by any reasonable reckoning, in 10 years.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): If one provides for a specified period—whether five or 10 years—does not the hon. Gentleman believe that, when one approaches it, an impetus would be created that perhaps would not exist if the normal process were followed?

David Mundell: Unless I misunderstand the hon. Gentleman, his intervention is an argument for the new clause, which provides that a referendum should take place in a fixed time period to focus minds on the matter, rather than some nebulous, distant provision. As many speakers have said, there is a lack of clarity about the Government's intentions. Do they want to increase powers and put the Welsh Assembly on the same footing as the Scottish Parliament, or are they simply conducting a smoke-and-mirrors exercise? The fact that they do not have the confidence to hold a referendum now or in 10 years leads me to suspect that there is no will in the Government or the Labour party in Wales to campaign on the issues in part 4. Unless the Under-Secretary says something new and surprising, we are not minded to accept an open-ended provision and we shall press the new clause to a Division. He may surprise us with something that gives us comfort or hope—we shall wait and see.

New clause 13 is about the frequency of referendums and its purpose is clear. It would prevent a further referendum on part 4 powers from taking place for at least four years after the date of the first one. It would thus prevent the Assembly from simply holding repeat referendums at regular intervals until the desired result was achieved. We believe that if a referendum on part 4 powers is held and the vote is no, the result should trigger a period of reflection.

A minimum interval of four years means that only one referendum could be held during an Assembly term. Any further referendums would have to be endorsed by the people of Wales at an Assembly election. We have heard much during our proceedings about the importance of election results in ascertaining the views of the people of Wales. It is therefore appropriate that they should have a say about whether a further referendum should be conducted shortly after a previous one.

I am not fully au fait with the details of the repeat referendums in Quebec in the 1970s and 1980s, but asking the same question repeatedly until the public are ground down, through a war of attrition, either to vote in a particular way or to turn out in low numbers is unsatisfactory. It is possible to envisage repeat referendums being used for political purposes rather than for taking forward the constitutional arrangements for Wales or for the enhancement of the Welsh Assembly.

Both the new clauses are fair and reasonable in the context of the Bill, and in the context of the debate about the appropriateness of holding referendums. As has been stated in the debates on previous amendments, the logic remains that a referendum should be held under the part 4 arrangements as soon as the legislation is passed, so that the people of Wales can give their view straight away. The matter would then be settled for a significant period. However, the Government are clearly not minded to do that and, in those circumstances, we would want to establish a process to ensure that there was a cap on the period in which a referendum had to be held. For the reasons that I have set out, we suggest a period of 10 years. In addition, new clause 13 would prevent the possibility of holding repeat referendums.

Nick Ainger: The practical effect of new clause 2 would be to ensure that a referendum under the terms of the Bill could not be called by Order in Council more than 10 years after the Bill had received Royal Assent. It will come as no surprise to the hon. Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell) that I cannot accept that such an arbitrary time limit on the possibility of enacting the part 4 provisions is necessary. Those provisions do not have a use-by date.

Under the Bill, the timing of a referendum would have to be considered and agreed on by a two-thirds majority in the Assembly and by both Houses of Parliament. That consideration by democratically elected bodies, and not an arbitrary 10-year time limit in the Bill, will ensure that the referendum is held at an appropriate time. The Secretary of State has said that he cannot see a referendum happening before 2011, because it makes sense to see how the provisions enabling the Assembly to make measures bed down first. I cannot predict at this stage exactly when a referendum should be held, and it would be inappropriate for me to say that a referendum should be held within 10 years, or not at all.

New clause 13 is aimed directly at ensuring that there would have to be a gap of four years between any referendum and an Order in Council calling for a further referendum. The fact that a referendum can be held only with the agreement of two thirds of the Assembly, the Secretary of State and both Houses of Parliament—all of whom would be aware of the financial and political cost of frequent repeated referendums—is safeguard enough in this respect. I fully agree that frequent referendums under the Bill would be counter-productive. However, the process for approving a call for a referendum that is built into the Bill will ensure that referendums are not called repeatedly for no good reason. I therefore invite the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the new clause.

David Mundell: As we anticipated, the Minister's response contained no surprises. I hope that he is correct about the issues raised by new clause 13, and that fiscal prudence, if nothing else, will prevent the repeated use of referendums. However, given that referendums have been called repeatedly in other jurisdictions when the political climate has been ripe for them, I do not believe that the possibility can be ruled out. I would have preferred to see the new clause being accepted.

I am not in the least satisfied by the Minister's response to my arguments on new clause 2. I do not believe that 10 years is an arbitrary period. I had understood that the Government were now going to promote the concept of sunset clauses in legislation. A period must necessarily be determined in which to hold the referendum, and 10 years is a fair period to choose. Circumstances could change significantly in that time, and if the Government and the Welsh Assembly were not confident that they could secure a majority in a referendum 10 years after the passage of the Bill, it would be appropriate to revisit the legislation and examine the issues relating to the powers involved. One reason for a lack of confidence in the result of a referendum might be to do with the nature and structure of the proposed legislation. On that basis, I intend to press new clause 2 to a vote.

New Clause 11

ALLOCATION OF FUNDS

'(1) The Secretary of State shall appoint a panel of not less than four and not more than six experts to recommend the sums of money to be allocated to the Welsh Consolidated Fund.

(2) The Secretary of State shall publish in full the terms of any recommendations made under subsection (1).

(3) The panel shall have regard to—

(a) the principle of fairness,

(b) the principle of transparency, and

(c) the particular needs of Wales.'.—[Lembit Öpik.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Lembit Öpik: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) and her colleagues for speaking so briefly on the preceding new clauses.

New clause 11 deals with the allocation of funds. It returns us to the age-old debate, which I have initiated many times over the past nine years, about the principles of fairness, transparency and a needs-based formula for conveying money to the Welsh Assembly and thus to the Welsh people. Currently, as all Members know, we have the Barnett formula, which is so discredited that Barnett himself—the inventor of the formula—says that he is ashamed to be associated with it. It was good for its time but its time has long gone, and for that reason we Liberal Democrats propose new clause 11, which would require the Secretary of State to "appoint a panel of not less than four and not more than six experts to recommend the sums of money to be allocated to the Welsh Consolidated Fund."

The Secretary of State would also be required to publish in full the terms of any funding recommendations made by the panel. Moreover, the panel would have specific regard to

"the principle of fairness . . . the principle of transparency . . . and . . . the particular needs of Wales."

The problem is that the Barnett formula is not needs-based and does not take account of the social and economic conditions of Wales. Furthermore, it has random unintended consequences that create difficulties in allocating funds to Welsh expenditure. If we compare what Wales is given with what it needs, it is clear that it often loses out. The levels of deprivation in Wales and its economic circumstances are often quite different from those in the rest of the UK. So our request is very simple: that the Government take on board a recommendation that has come from all quarters, including from the inventor of the existing formula himself; and that, for once, they listen to recommendations—made, on this occasion, by Opposition politicians—based on common sense.

Mrs. Gillan: The other day, the First Minister said that Wales has 5 per cent. of the UK's population and makes 4 per cent. of its income but receives 6 per cent. of that income. Does the hon. Gentleman envisage improving those figures through his new clause, or worsening them?

Lembit Öpik: We are not seeking to gerrymander the formula in favour of Wales; rather we are trying to ensure that it is fair to Wales—and, for that matter, to Scotland and Northern Ireland—by it being needs-based. We have to take the chance that, as Wales prospers under a Liberal Democrat Administration, its funding will be less because its needs will be less. But so far as we are concerned, this is not about begging bowls and asking for more; rather, we are asking for fairness. As the new clause makes clear, are the right bases on which to allocate funds.

"fairness . . . transparency . . . and the particular needs of Wales"

In conclusion, I look forward to hearing what the Minister and others have to say. I hope that he will say that he has been persuaded by the arguments—arguments that have been made many times before—and that he will incorporate the new clause. If he does, he will be a hero not just to the Liberal Democrats but to the people of Wales. If he does not, he will stand condemned alongside other Ministers who have shown a similar unwillingness to demonstrate the ability to listen that this "listening" Government so often claim for themselves.

Mrs. Gillan: I was not going to speak to this new clause—until I heard what the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) had to say, whereupon I was forced to my feet. I am sorry to say that if he presses it to a vote, I will be unable to recommend to my hon. Friends that they support him, not least because of the wishy-washy nature of subsection (3). [Interruption.] Someone said "Surely not" from a sedentary position, but is fairly wishy-washy and imprecise language, as I anticipate the Minister will agree.

This is possibly a good-hearted attempted by the Liberal Democrats and I do want to be fair to the hon. Gentleman, who is probably leading with his heart but certainly not with his head. As he just said, if, under this new and magic formula Wales gets less money, well, so be it. Of course, much as that might appeal to people in Northern Ireland, Scotland and England, I doubt whether the people of Wales would be very happy to discover such an attitude toward the support that they receive. As I pointed out earlier, the First Minister has said that he supports the current situation. I therefore doubt very much whether the Government will accept the new clause—particularly given that it has not been planted and then moved by a Labour Back Bencher, but has genuinely come from the Liberal Democrats—because doing so would put them directly at odds with the First Minister.

8.15 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I am most grateful to the hon. Lady for giving way. She is obviously taking a view in her capacity as shadow Secretary of State for Wales, but does she not think that a fairer and more transparent system would be in the interests of many of the English constituents whom she and I represent?

Mrs. Gillan: The hon. Gentleman is perhaps in danger of being ruled out of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. [Interruption.] You are indeed nodding, and we are not going to go down that route. We are not discussing the English regions, much, of course, to his chagrin; rather, we are discussing Wales and the people of Wales and what is best for them.

Although the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire has tabled the new clause with hope in his heart, to be fair to the people of Wales, he is probably doing them a great disservice in doing so. If he presses it to a vote, I will be unable to support it.

Adam Price: I am disappointed to hear the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan)—who has been gracious, as ever—say that, unfortunately, the Conservatives will not support the new clause, despite the spirit of revisionism that seems to be blowing through their party as we speak. This is an opportunity for us to raise the hugely important question of the Barnett formula, which is a non-statutory formula. Indeed, this is one of the few opportunities that we have had in recent years to force a vote on this issue, which, notwithstanding law-making powers and the various other important matters that we have been discussing, is probably the single most important determinant of the Assembly's and the Assembly Government's ability to improve the lives of the people of Wales.

The Barnett formula is a convergent formula: over time, it results in a fall in the relative position of public expenditure per capita in Wales, compared with

[Adam Price]

England. For example, only six years ago—in 1999–2000—the public expenditure per capita index figure for devolved services in Wales was 115. Now, it has fallen to 112, which is a very significant relative fall over that period. That process will continue until we reach the point at which Wales and England are exactly the same, even though there is no guarantee that the level of need in Wales and England—the economic and social position—will be identical. That is why we must support the principle of a needs-based formula.

Mrs. Gillan: This matter is far too important to be discussed in the dying minutes of consideration on Report. It demands full and fair examination at another point, and in that regard I am in agreement with the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik). Before I paint myself into a corner, let me reiterate that this issue needs discussion, but not at 19 minutes past 8 o'clock, with a guillotine about to fall at 8.30.

Adam Price: I accept that and look forward to the Conservative party devoting one of its Opposition days to a call for the revision of the Barnett formula. We would support such a motion, as we will support the Liberal Democrats in the Lobby tonight. This matter is far too important to be left to party politics.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham mentioned the First Minister, Rhodri Morgan, and said that he supported the Barnett formula. I am sure that he does now, but in 1997 he told the Treasury Committee that the formula was "detrimental" to Wales. Moreover, he said in an interview with John Humphrys that the formula was "putting a lot of pressure on expenditure in Wales. We now cannot keep up with the percentage increases in health and education that the Department of Health and the Department of Education and Employment are doing in England."

That shows that the First Minister at that time supported our proposals. As has happened all too often, however, he has failed to support our position now.

The Government claim that there is no evidence for the position adopted by my party and others, but there is plenty, and the amount is growing. As the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) said, even the formula's progenitor agrees that it is long overdue for revision. If we do not act now, we will continue to suffer.

I appeal to Labour Members—we must move away from the Barnett formula. It is detrimental to Wales, and Northern Ireland is also beginning to suffer from the effects of the Barnett squeeze. The problem will continue to get worse, unless and until we get a proper formula that is fair to the nations of these islands and to the regions of England. It is a matter of territorial justice; for example, per capital expenditure on public services in some parts of the south-west region of England is very low. We need a root and branch reform of the allocation of finances in these islands.

Kevin Brennan: The problem with new clause 11 is that it would set up a panel of so-called experts to make recommendations about the Welsh block grant. In other words, it would create another new quango to determine how much money would be devoted to public expenditure in Wales.

The Barnett formula has been used for some time to determine public expenditure in Wales, and has produced significant increases in that expenditure, but the quango created by the new clause would make recommendations in isolation from the rest of the UK. It would not pay heed to fairness, transparency and the particular needs of Wales—language that the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) described as "wishy-washy".

Essentially, the new clause would adjust public expenditure in Wales according to the views of the panel of experts, but in isolation from what was happening with public expenditure in the rest of the UK. However, funding public expenditure in Wales cannot be separated from what happens in the UK as a whole. I think that hon. Members recognise that, although the new clause does not.

No rational system of resource allocation for public expenditure could ever consider funding the needs of one part of the UK in isolation from the whole, as that would make it impossible to manage any logical process for setting budgets. The Barnett formula is operated by the Treasury, and it determines the funding allocations for Northern Ireland and Scotland as well as for Wales. However, this Bill deals only with Wales, and so is inappropriate for the new clause's proposal to abandon the Barnett formula in respect of Wales alone and replace it with a new system for allocating public expenditure there.

The Barnett formula has been criticised by various hon. Members, but it has worked well in practice. It has provided a stable and secure financial context, and allowed the National Assembly to plan public expenditure with some confidence. The National Assembly has received financial settlements without the need for lengthy annual negotiations with the Treasury. The Barnett formula is a relatively simple mechanism, whereby money is allocated to the National Assembly in a way that is open, transparent and comprehensible to the people of Wales.

The Barnett formula ensures that changes to planned public expenditure on comparable services in England are properly reflected in the budget in Wales. The formula will provide average growth of more than 4 per cent. each year in the period since the spending review of 2004. All public institutions must be realistic and work within a fixed budget. They have to concentrate on the outcomes of the use of public money, and not just on the quantum figure, important though that is.

The National Assembly Government are committed to providing quality public services, using the funding provided through the Barnett formula. As a result of that process, the Assembly budget has risen from less than £8 billion in 1999 to more than £14 billion in 2007–08. That means that the budget has almost doubled in that period.

I confirm that the Government have no plans to review the Barnett formula, which has served the UK very effectively. In practice, it has produced reasonably fair settlements, and we will continue to monitor its operation to ensure that it is being applied properly and rigorously. Clearly, the mechanism has some advantages in the context of devolved government, and indeed it was developed originally by Joel Barnett in the 1970s when the question of devolution was first visited.

The Barnett formula is simple to understand, and provides the degree of stability that is essential in the consequential flow of resources to Wales. It also allows Administrations a considerable degree of freedom when it comes to making spending decisions. The Government have looked carefully at the matter, but we have concluded that there is no advantage in reopening the question of the Barnett formula at this time.

New clause 11 is well meaning, but would be unworkable in practice. It would create yet another quango, and mean that decisions about public expenditure in Wales would be made outside the context of such decisions in respect of the rest of the UK.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) said that the funding calculation was too important to be decided in the dying moments of the Report stage of this Bill. We agree, which is why we tabled the new clause. We are suggesting that the experts should say how we decide the formulation. We all agree that there are flaws in the system, and the Liberal Democrats feel that the flaws are so significant that we should change the formula.

The hon. Lady also quoted the First Minister in defence of the existing formulation, but we have heard from the hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) that the First Minister himself has criticised the formula on other occasions, when it suited him to do so. We cannot pretend that he has any consistent form on the issue.

Ranting a series of numbers at the Opposition is not a sufficient defence of the existing formulation. This is not about specific figures, but about fairness and transparency. I must point out to the Minister that it is obvious that when we talk about the principle of fairness, that has to be seen in the context of the UK. When we talk about the principle of transparency, that has to be seen alongside the principle of collective decision making, not as some isolationist approach for Wales. And when we talk about the particular needs of Wales, of course we have to think about the needs of the rest of the UK as well. For those reasons, the Minister should recognise the strength of feeling that many of us have in favour of a change—and that is why I need to press the new clause to a vote.

New Clause 12

BUSINESS SCHEME

'(1) The Welsh Ministers must make a scheme ("the business scheme") setting out how they propose, in the exercise of their functions, to take account of the interests of business.

(2) The business scheme must specify how the Welsh Ministers propose—

(a) to carry out consultation about the exercise of such of their functions as relate to matters affecting the interests of business, and

(b) to consider the impact of the exercise of their functions on the interests of business.

(3) The Welsh Ministers—

(a) must keep the business scheme under review, and

(b) may from time to time remake or revise it.

(4) Before making, remaking or revising the business scheme, the Welsh Ministers must consult such organisations representative of business (including trade unions) and such other organisations as they consider appropriate.

(5) The Welsh Ministers must publish the business scheme when they make it and whenever they remake it; and, if they revise the scheme without remaking it, they must publish either the revisions or the scheme as revised (as they consider appropriate).

(6) If the Welsh Ministers publish a scheme or revisions under subsection (5) they must lay a copy of the scheme or revisions before the Assembly.

(7) The Welsh Ministers must—

(a) within the period of two years beginning with the day on which the business scheme is first made, and

(b) subsequently at intervals of no more than two years,

publish a report of how the proposals set out in the business scheme have been implemented.

(8) The Welsh Ministers must lay before the Assembly a copy of each report published under subsection (7).'.—[Huw Irranca-Davies.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

Order for Third Reading read.

8.42 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

If I may say so, Madam Deputy Speaker, to have a daughter of Wales in the Chair at this time is indeed most appropriate.

St. David's day, tomorrow, sees the official opening of the inspirational new Assembly building in Cardiff bay—the very same building where the Bill was launched only two and a half months ago. A truly iconic building that has attracted architectural acclaim from all over the world, I have no doubt that it will become a powerful symbol of the new Wales. With the Bill now empowering the Assembly to be bolder and more ambitious than ever before, the people of Wales have all the more reason to feel proud.

Devolution and decentralisation of power have been watchwords of the Labour Government. Just as one of our first acts in 1997 was to bring forward proposals for an Assembly for Wales, so we have moved swiftly in our third term to build on the success of devolution. Once again, that destroys the myth that any party other than Labour is the true party of devolution. It was a Labour Government who appointed the first ever Secretary of State for Wales. It was a Labour Government who broadened and deepened the role of the then Welsh Office. It was a Labour Government who passed the first Welsh Language Act in 1967 and it was a Labour Government who called the 1997 referendum and then passed legislation for a democratically elected Assembly for Wales.

No other party has come anywhere near to delivering so much for Wales. Indeed, no other party has ever delivered any devolution for Wales. So as we commemorate 100 years of the parliamentary Labour party, we can be truly proud that devolution, one of the ideals of our first parliamentary leader, Keir Hardie, has not only been achieved, but is being improved. Once again, it is Labour and only Labour that is delivering on devolution.

I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Wales for his sterling work on the Bill. After four years of silence in the confines of the Whips Office, his voice has been heard during the five days of consideration that the House has given to the Bill. He has dealt patiently and diligently with the issues that Members have raised.

I should also like to express my appreciation of the work of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Kevin Brennan), who, notwithstanding his role as a Whip, has also been able to assist in the progress of the Bill from the Front Bench. Similarly, I thank my Parliamentary Private Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Chris Ruane), who has supported me with his customary energy and enthusiasm—the quietest man in the House. Above all, I thank my excellent team of hard-working officials, drawn from both the Welsh Assembly and our own Wales Office—a partnership in action.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Aberavon (Dr. Francis), who, with the members of his Select Committee, produced a report on the Bill that helped to inform our deliberations. As I have said previously, I envisage his Committee playing a very significant role in the pre-legislative scrutiny of the proposed Orders in Council that will come before the House by virtue of the proposals contained in part 3. Such pre-scrutiny is crucial, and it will be open to all Members to submit written evidence for consideration, or even to seek to give oral testimony if they so prefer.

I am glad that we have been able to subject the Bill to detailed scrutiny, through some 33 hours of debate on the Floor of the House. The House will be aware that the vast bulk of the Bill was either modelled closely on the Government of Wales Act 1998, or modelled on other statutory provisions that have worked effectively. The finance provisions, for example, draw heavily on those in the Scotland Act 1998. Those 141 clauses have broad cross-party support. I am therefore particularly pleased that the House was able to concentrate its scrutiny on those parts of the Bill that are genuinely new—the 24 clauses on enhanced and primary powers and our proposed electoral changes. Those are clearly the most significant parts of the Bill, and I am pleased that they have been given such thorough consideration.

One thing that has not survived the scrutiny of the House is the credibility of the Opposition and their new, supposedly more constructive stance on devolution. First, they tried to scupper the Bill at the outset by tabling a reasoned amendment on Second Reading, and I am told that they may even vote against the Bill on Third Reading. Then they attempted to construct a process of 16 locks to hamper the Assembly acquiring enhanced legislative powers. Then we saw them try to insist on a referendum before Parliament could grant the Assembly even a modest extension of its legislative powers through the Order-in-Council process. Then they tabled amendments that would have reduced the democratically elected Assembly to little more than a Committee of Parliament.

Finally, the Opposition tried to strike enhanced powers out of the Bill altogether, even though such powers were a clear Labour election manifesto commitment. It is hard to square that approach with the view of their leader, the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron), who says that he wants to make devolution work. It is even harder to reconcile that with his opinion that, on devolution, the Tories share the views of the Liberal Democrats. They called themselves liberal Conservatives in the recent Scottish by-election. Well, there is not much liberal about their attitude to Wales. I thought the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) would bring a new approach; instead, she has played the same old Tory gramophone record of suspicion and hostility to more powers for Wales.

On dual candidacy, we have learned that the Opposition are against the ban because, as the shadow Attorney-General told us, they > "wish to maximise the chance of getting their chosen people into the Assembly.—[Official Report, 30 January 2006; Vol. 442, c. 112.]

The hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Jones) was worried that such a reform would make life tougher for weak Tory candidates. The Government's view remains that such matters are for the electorate, rather than the political parties, to determine, so we intend to put the voters back in charge by requiring candidates to choose between the constituency and the list seats and by removing the ability of candidates to guarantee election for themselves regardless of the voters' verdict. There will be no more each-way bets at the voters' expense.

We have made great progress in Wales since the establishment of the Assembly, through a strong partnership between our UK Government and Rhodri Morgan's Labour Welsh Assembly Government. Wales has a strong economy, more jobs, rising prosperity, better hospitals and better schools, but it still has huge challenges to face. Levels of economic inactivity are still far too high. Welsh industry is facing tough global economic competition. Although crime is falling compared with the situation under the Conservative Government, it must be reduced still further, and antisocial behaviour must be combated. We also face important decisions on energy policy to cut costs, guarantee security of supply and keep Wales clean and green. By giving the Assembly the means, through the Bill, to respond to those huge challenges, we will enable Welsh politics to focus on policy delivery, rather than debate about more or fewer powers.

[Mr. Peter Hain]

The Bill will settle the constitutional debate in Wales for a generation. For the first time ever, it places full law-making powers for Wales on the statute book. It also recognises the need to proceed by consensus, requiring a referendum while providing a path towards primary powers when that consensus emerges. Some argue that that does not go far enough and that we should move to a referendum immediately. All I say to them is: remember what happened in 1979. The defeat then set back the cause of devolution for a generation. Even in 1997, when all the parties except the Tories were united, we only just squeaked home. I have no doubt that if a referendum were held today, it would be lost. Indeed, I cannot see it happening before the end of this decade.

I urge all supporters of primary powers, of whom I am one, to recognise the need for consensus. The Bill provides a route to primary powers, but places the responsibility on supporters of primary powers to go out there, build a consensus and win the argument. In the meantime, the Bill develops the existing devolution settlement by conferring enhanced legislative powers on the Assembly—while ensuring that Parliament remains in overall control—and giving it greater discretion to determine the detail of Welsh legislation. That streamlined procedure will enable the Assembly to break free from the Westminster logjam, while ensuring that the final say remains with Parliament just as it does today, as was endorsed in the 1997 referendum. The Bill also means that the Assembly will start to gain new powers from 2007—four years earlier than the Richard commission recommended.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy), whom I commend for his insightful contributions during the course of our deliberations on the Bill, has referred to the views of the man in Splott market. I am sure that he would agree that the true test of devolution is whether it enables us to deliver positive benefits and lasting changes to the lives of our constituents, whether they be in Cardiff, Pontypool, Neath or Holyhead. The Bill will enable the Assembly to achieve exactly that. It is right at the political centre of gravity in Wales. It provides for better, more responsive, more accountable Welsh government and helps us to build a world-class Wales.

The Bill will provide a lasting constitutional settlement for Wales. It establishes a flexible constitutional architecture that will adapt to Wales's changing needs over the years to come. It is designed to endure. Whatever changing circumstances we face over the coming years, there will be no case for a successor Government of Wales Bill in the decades to come—this really is it. I commend the Bill to the House.

Mrs. Gillan: I offer the Secretary of State and all Welsh Members my best wishes for St. David's day tomorrow. I was at a delightful service earlier today in St. Mary Undercroft with the Under-Secretary of State for Wales. Together with the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Jenny Willott), we had the privilege of contributing to the service to celebrate St. David's day. I was sporting a daffodil at that stage, but I am not now because I gave it to a little girl—I think from the London Welsh school—who was also performing at the service. I thought that that was rather nice because she was able to take it home to her mother. I notice that Members on the Labour Front Bench are already wearing their daffodils, but that the Secretary of State's daffodil is wilting rather badly. That, I hope, is a reflection on Labour's fortunes in Wales, particularly after this Bill.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friends for their assistance on the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) argued with great erudition, particularly on using Orders in Council to delegate law making to secondary legislation. It is always a pleasure to listen to him. He is exact and precise, and he has not found his equal at the Dispatch Box in the Under-Secretary. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfriesshire, Clydesdale and Tweeddale (David Mundell), who I think is taking a well earned break, having been on the Bench alongside me for many hours, has argued from a position of great knowledge on devolution, particularly in Scotland. It is sad that the arguments made by Opposition Members have been swept aside by the Government and given little credence.

There have been valuable contributions from Opposition Members. I draw attention in particular to those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer). I am pleased to note that the three Conservative Members with Welsh seats have all participated in the proceedings on the Bill. I wish that the same could be said for Labour Members with Welsh seats, not all of whom, I am afraid, have taken an active part or interest in the passage of the Bill.

I started on Second Reading with a positive attitude towards the Bill. There were some aspects on which we agreed with the Government and others that we drew to their attention in the hope that they would rethink their proposals. We purposely did not vote against Second Reading, but chose to highlight the problem areas of the legislation with a reasoned amendment, which we used expressly to launch our concerns about some of the matters in the Bill. With the new, strong intention of my party to try to make devolution work for the people of Wales, I had hoped that the Government would respond positively to our concerns, but that has not been the case.

We see successful devolution depending not only on the support of the people but on some broad political consensus, requiring in turn constructive dialogue between the political parties. We have seen little or none of that during the Bill's passage, and I notice that the other Opposition parties also received scant responses to their points. They have been swept aside and ignored by the Labour machine, which cannot bear to be questioned on any part of the Bill.

In fact, the only amendments that have been accepted are those tabled by the hon. Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). I will examine carefully what the Minister said about that, but that appeared to be a Government-placed new clause and amendment because they came as very little surprise to the Minister. [Interruption.] Yes, the new clause came from the CBI and the TUC, but it could just as easily have been tabled by the Government as by the hon. Member for Ogmore.

I congratulate him on managing to at least produce some amendment to the Bill, which otherwise appears to be totally unamendable—it has much in common with the Assembly Measures that it sets up.

As the Bill has progressed, more issues have emerged, and even the Father of the House has expressed disquiet at some of the provisions. Various claims of support put forward by the Government have not prospered under close scrutiny, and it has become apparent that Labour is putting party politics before the interests of people in Wales. If we are to have a devolution arrangement in Wales that is built to last, we will need more thought and consultation with the people of Wales than is evidenced by this Bill, and all-party support as far as possible.

Briefly, taking the parts in turn, on part 1 we agree with many of the provisions. However, the partisan way in which the Government have plucked out a change to the electoral arrangements to placate their own party members and against any clear advice from the Arbuthnott commission, the Electoral Commission, leading academics and even Labour-sponsored research projects, has made a mockery of their attitude toward the Assembly itself. Even there, a tied vote on that subject revealed that only Labour Assembly Members wanted the change, and in Divisions during our debates in this place, we have had the support of all the Opposition parties. A further change at this stage will undermine electoral confidence at a time when education of the electorate would seem to be the priority, in the interests of electors themselves. Furthermore, banning dual candidacy may impinge on candidates' human rights. I hope that the Members of the other place will look closely at those provisions, coupled with those in clause 11.

We support and agree with the separation of powers of the Assembly and the Executive in part 2. That, in itself, would have justified a Bill that would have received all-party support of the sort that the Government should have sought on changes in the constitutional position of Wales.

Part 3 is fraught with problems. It introduces the Order in Council provisions, which amount to primary legislation by the back door, to cure an alleged legislative blockage, which has not been proved under questioning. I do not know who is the author of that tortuous legislative route, but it cannot be one who has the best interests of the Assembly in his heart. The procedure is devolution by statutory instrument—or, as the Father of the House said, devolution by salami-slicing. It is a device for saying one thing to one audience and another thing to another, as was pointed out by Lord Richard, whose report has largely been pushed to one side. Lord Richard has expressed some major qualifications in respect of procedure, so I hope that he and his colleagues in the other House will examine the proposals, not least because, if viewed in conjunction with the Legislative and Regulatory Reform Bill, which moves the Executive away from traditional ways of legislating to Orders in Council, they lead me to believe that we need to exercise great caution about the ways in which we are changing our systems.

We have argued that, if part 3 does indeed delegate the substantial powers to which the Secretary of State referred, that should be put to the people of Wales. Apparently, that is not a route that the Government are willing to take in respect of either the part 3 powers or the part 4 powers, unless and until they can win any referendum put to the electors. The Bill is not about consulting the people of Wales but about achieving a Labour agenda.

The Secretary of State said that part 4 will settle the constitutional issue for a generation—a claim that he repeated this evening. How can that be, when part 4 leaves the question of additional powers wide open? How can it be, when not even the number of MPs has been discussed, or the number of AMs that might be required if the Assembly takes on the full law-making powers set out in part 4? Some Labour Members have suggested that the whole electoral system should be reviewed; perhaps it would have been better to reflect on that.

The Bill leaves the House with a lot of unfinished business and with a Government who are trying to create the impression that they are pro-Wales but, after scrutiny by Opposition parties, it has emerged that they are, in fact, purely pro-Labour. Claims have crumbled under scrutiny. The Secretary of State prayed in aid Lord Dahrendorf, Lord Holme and Sir John Arbuthnott, but his claims proved to be not strictly accurate. His claim that there is a legislative blockage hardly stood up to scrutiny, and his claim of abuse by AMs of the electoral system has not been substantiated. He has ignored the Richard commission, Assembly Members, the Electoral Commission, the Electoral Reform Society and leading academics to go his own way and produce legislation that means that the people of Wales will not be consulted at the right time and that will give more responsibility to the Labour Assembly Government before they have even got to grips with the responsibilities that they already have.

The Assembly Government have not yet grasped the new local democracy with efficiency or effectiveness. They have broken promises to the electorate—for example, on free care for the disabled and free breakfasts for all primary school kids. They have ditched targets on economic matters, truancy rates and GCSE pass rates, and they have presided over huge increases in waiting lists for operations. That is to name only a few areas in which the performance of the Welsh Assembly Labour Government needs to be improved. To give the Labour Assembly Government more powers before they have flourished and got to grips with the difficult business of governing in areas already under their control is like suffocating the institution before it has embarked on its democratic journey. Faith in the Labour Assembly Government is fragile. Turnout fell at the last Assembly elections by 8 per cent. to 36 per cent., and the Electoral Commission said that that was the result of a lack of awareness of the role of the Assembly and a growing disconnection between the politicians and parts of the electorate.

The Secretary of State said at the time that the low turnout was dreadful and that politicians were "talking past the people". I agree, but it is the Secretary of State who is talking past the people in the Bill. I want the Assembly and the Assembly Government to do a good job for the people of Wales, and my party wants them to succeed. The Bill includes some good proposals, but the Government could not resist the chance to play party politics with it. It is therefore with a heavy and a disappointed heart that, to support the Assembly and to give the people of Wales a voice, I urge my colleagues to vote against the Bill. I regret that we were unable to have a better dialogue with the Government during its passage.

I want no nonsense from the Secretary of State and I do not want to hear his usual track of alleging that Conservatives are against devolution. He knows that that is not true. We want to make devolution work and we want it to secure substantial cross-party agreement on many matters. Ours is not an anti-devolution vote, nor is it an anti-Assembly vote. It is a vote against a Government who put party before people. That is not good for the House, and it is not good for Wales. The Opposition will do everything they can to explain to the people of Wales that the Labour Government are trying to manipulate their future for 10 or 15 years on the basis of a Labour fix while they remain in power. I sincerely hope that they will lose that power at the next Assembly election in 2007. In the meantime, to protect the health of the Assembly, its effectiveness and efficiency, and in the interests of the people of Wales, the Opposition have been forced by the intransigence of the Secretary of State and the Government to vote against the Bill.

9.7 pm

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South) (Lab): I did not take part in Committee, for the very good reason that I believed that the Government had achieved the right level of devolution and introduced the necessary changes in Wales for the Assembly to further its powers and grow in the way that we all want. I believe that Committee is the appropriate forum for Members to voice their concerns to the Government. I welcome the amendments that have been made, but I am disappointed that the Opposition are going to vote against the Bill.

Chris Ruane: It is a total surprise.

Mr. Jones: I am surprised, and it is a shame. We should vote collectively for a very good Bill which, I hope, will become a very good Act that will support devolution in Wales and throughout the UK, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, for a generation to come.

Mr. David Jones: How does the hon. Gentleman square his last statement with the fact that in the Welsh Affairs Committee he voted for the abolition option in any future referendum?

Mr. Jones: I do not regard that as a problem at all. I believe that the referendum could offer other options, but I am happy with the provision in the Bill.

David T.C. Davies rose—

Mr. Jones: The hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) may wish to raise other desirable options. I would have liked a provision to elect 40 male and 40 female Members, so that there is an in-built gender balance. However, that is not the way this place works. The Bill, on the whole, is acceptable to my electorate and will carry forward devolution in Wales, as I said.

David T.C. Davies: The comment that we should all vote for the Bill because the hon. Gentleman happens to think it is a good idea is extraordinary, especially given the fact that, in opposition, Labour Members often voted against Bills, such as the Maastricht Bill and even the Welsh Language Act 1993, which they subsequently thought were quite good ideas. They always put their party politics first. We are putting our principles first tonight.

Mr. Jones: I cannot follow the logic of that: when we were in opposition, we did not put our principles first, but the Conservatives are doing the same as we did in opposition. I find that a bizarre argument. I am more than happy to support the Government on a Bill which, overall, is good for Wales.

9.10 pm

Lembit Öpik: We have heard some interesting debates and exchanges, not least the rather curious claim from the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies) that as the hon. Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) points out, something that is rank and despicable when Labour does it is a matter of positive principle when done by the Conservatives. But that is not the only reversal that we have witnessed in the five days of debate on the Bill. Who would have predicted at the turn of the century that there would come a debate and a vote where the Government argued passionately in favour of the d'Hondt electoral mechanism and the Liberal Democrats voted against it? What a remarkable turn of events.

We also had the remarkable discovery of a mysterious and shady organisation, the Bevan Foundation, and we unveiled some research sponsored by a cheeky monkey from Caerphilly, as it turned out. He is not in his place today. I presume he is out there trying to prove, together with another 47 random members of the public, that 35 per cent. constitutes a majority. The most surprising claim is that because the Conservatives support devolution, they will vote against it. I studied philosophy at university, and I never came across that kind of logic. I got a 2:1, so I was not too bad at it.

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) said some interesting things in the spirit of the new liberal Conservatism that did so well in Dunfermline. She said a moment ago that she had started with a positive attitude towards the Bill on Second Reading. Let me remind her that she said on 9 January that

"as Leader of the Opposition just before Christmas my right hon. Friend"—

I presume she meant the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron)—

"made it clear that devolution and the National Assembly are now established features of the Welsh political landscape. I hope that the Secretary of State will resist the temptation to revisit past battles over devolution and misrepresent out position. A future Conservative Government will seek a constructive relationship with the Assembly".

As far as I can tell, one can judge a party by what it does, and today, if I understood the hon. Lady correctly, the Conservative party, the official Opposition, will vote down a flawed but nevertheless genuine contribution to the devolution debate and to devolution. I agree that the Bill is disappointing, but why vote against it? Surely she understands that all the high talk about a pro-devolution Conservative Government does not stand up if the Conservatives cannot even bring themselves to support such a limited and timid measure as the Government offer.

On the subject of fighting old battles, the hon. Lady will remember that the hon. Member for Monmouth said on 9 January:

"I was delighted to stand against the original proposals for the Welsh Assembly. I can see that it has had some advantages in terms of openness, but those advantages do not outweigh the disadvantages. We have caused enormous damage to the UK".—[Official Report, 9 January 2006; Vol. 441, c. 46, 88.]

The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham has said that her party is united, and the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) criticised my suggestion that there are splits. However, I did not make up those two quotations, which were made in the same debate by Conservative Members of Parliament. The biggest irony is that the Conservative Member who talks down devolution is a Welsh Member.

David T.C. Davies rose—

Lembit Öpik: I knew that that would work.

David T.C. Davies: If the hon. Gentleman were to shorten his speech, he would get to hear some more comments. I am sure that many people would like to hear from the monkey rather than the organ grinder.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I would rather hear about the content of the Bill.

Lembit Öpik: I would be happy to take lessons from Conservative Members, if the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), who is apparently a Welsh nationalist, had stayed for Third Reading instead of making—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we should discuss the content of the Bill.

Lembit Öpik: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker. If the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal were available for comment, I am sure that he would have something to say in his defence, but no doubt he is at home writing his next speech on Northern Ireland or Scotland.

Although I have had a little bit of fun at the expense of Conservative Members, my criticism of the Conservative party is entirely serious. The Conservative party cannot be credible on devolution if it offers vague, warm words about hoping that the Bill would be good enough by Third Reading while behaving in a way that shows that its colours have not changed one iota on devolution. I believe that the mood of the hon. Member for Monmouth is in tune with what is going on in the Conservative party.

The Bill poses real dilemmas for the Liberal Democrats. We are a pro-devolution party that believes passionately in the best devolutionary arrangement for Wales, which was set out by the Richard commission. The Richard commission proposed an 80-Member Senedd with primary law-making powers elected by a single transferable vote system, and the Bill delivers some of that. The Bill provides two pathways for the Assembly to gain primary legislative powers, which are otherwise known as Assembly Measures, namely the Order in Council procedure and a referendum in Wales. It also creates a strong and clear basis for the Assembly to exercise greater powers more efficiently by separating the Assembly's Executive and legislative elements. That change was so desperately needed that the Assembly was heading that way itself through various ad hoc measures, and it is to the Government's credit that they have formalised that distinction. The Bill is a step away from the Conservative anti-devolution strategy, which would significantly dilute the potential for Wales to gain primary legislative powers by putting a whole series of restrictions and conditions between where the Liberal Democrats would like the Welsh Assembly to be and where it actually is.

So much more could have been done in the Bill, which is the product of compromise not with other parties or pro-devolution organisations in Wales, but with Labour Back Benchers. By caving in to internal pressure, the Government have missed an opportunity, and a number of points will need to be reconsidered in a future reworking of the devolution argument. In fairness, the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham has highlighted concerns that we share. The extreme concentration of power in the hands of the Secretary of State is not appropriate. The arrangement is almost colonial: unlike Scotland, Wales must go cap in hand to the Secretary of State for Wales.

The Secretary of State can turn down requests for pretty much any reason. As the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham said, every one of the modest changes that we proposed to reduce the Secretary of State's governor-like potential to intervene was rejected. The Welsh Affairs Committee said that "the Secretary of State's powers should be limited to refusing Orders in Council on the basis of procedure, not the merits of policy aspiration."

The Secretary of State can shake his head, but he must recognise that the limitations proposed by the Committee have been ignored.

The banning of dual candidacy has been discussed in great detail. We feel that there is no justification for that, as did the Richard commission. The Government have acted in a way that I can understand emotionally but is not right in terms of human rights and democracy. Having people standing in a list on a constituency basis does not devalue the integrity of the electoral system or act as a disincentive to vote in constituency elections. Nevertheless, we lost that vote, and Welsh democracy has been somewhat compromised as a result.

We talked about the Barnett formula and the injustices of having a somewhat random formulation. I proposed, and we voted on, the modest request for a panel of experts to suggest how it could be done better, but even that was not accepted by the Government.

[Lembit Öpik]

The limit on the scope of the Welsh Assembly's powers is another frustration. The Secretary of State rightly commented on Wales's potential to be a beacon for the environment, yet the Assembly does not even have the power to legislate on power stations over 50 MW. That could become very significant in the nuclear debate.

On powers over policing, we all know that the majority of people in Wales, and a large proportion of police officers themselves, are opposed to the centralist—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman once again that a Third Reading debate concerns the contents of the Bill rather than what is not included?

Lembit Öpik: All right. Nevertheless, Madam Deputy Speaker, we did discuss those issues, and in every single case I felt that the Government were not only intransigent but completely unwilling to listen to the many reasonable points made by Members on both sides of the House.

Mrs. Gillan: I am listening to the hon. Gentleman very carefully. He has read out a catalogue of aspects of the Bill with which he categorically does not agree. How does he think that he will help the Assembly and the people of Wales by abstaining or voting for it? Can I persuade him to join me in the Lobby with the intention of voting to try to improve the situation for the Assembly, and not to accept the flawed Bill to which he has outlined his objections?

Lembit Öpik: Despite its imperfections, of which there are many, the Bill is marginally better than the existing arrangements. The channels to primary powers, narrow though they are, represent an improvement on the Government of Wales Act 1998, the passage of which I was as intimately involved in. Liberal Democrats will support the Bill because it is a small step in the right direction towards the truly democratic and authoritative representative body that Wales needs and desires. What matters now is that we understand the way in which the new system will work. In particular, I hope that the Secretary of State will apply his mind to the many criticisms of the Orders-in-Council process that he envisages. I am not even sure that we have spotted all the unintended consequences, but I suspect that it will be fraught with problems.

My answer to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham is that we have to make a judgment about the real situation. Instead of making the tokenistic gesture of filing into the No Lobby, as if that is in any way a responsible and mature commitment to what we are trying to achieve, we will, with a heavy heart, vote with the Government.

The Conservatives feel uncomfortable about that because it serves only to highlight their anti-devolution position and I am not surprised that they want members of other parties to vote against the Bill, but there is no prospect of the Liberal Democrats doing that.

Mrs. Gillan: Hypocrisy.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Lady accuses me of hypocrisy. How ironic that she does that after pretending to hope that the Bill would change so much that she could vote for it on Third Reading. She pretended that, in all but absolute fact, the Conservatives voted against Second Reading, dressed up as voting for a reasoned amendment. She should be cautious before accusing me of hypocrisy. I may be many things—an unsuccessful punter when it comes to the leadership election in my party—but I do not believe that I am hypocrite.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can take some of the heat out of the debate and remind the hon. Gentleman again that we are debating Third Reading.

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham is now blackmailing me from a sedentary position and it has worked. I shall move on to my conclusion.

The true party of devolution—the Liberal party—was talking about devolution when the Labour party was in short pants. It is a delight to witness the first faltering steps towards a grasp of what devolution means. I know that the Secretary of State, who is truly in favour of devolution, would perhaps like to go further.

Mr. Hain: I would not.

Lembit Öpik: In his heart, the Secretary of State is a Liberal, and hope springs eternal.

Although we hoped for a big step forward, we have a small shuffle in the right direction. However, even the Bill's modest powers are better than nothing. I assure hon. Members that Liberal Democrats will continue to dream of a devolution settlement that is worthy of the nation that we represent. It is a shame that the Government found themselves snoozing for five days at the various stages of the Bill's passage. However, I hope that, through working together, the Government will perceive the flaws in the measure and have the humility to come back and put right the elements that they have allowed to go badly wrong in the five days and 33 hours that we have had in which to debate the matter so far.

Dr. Hywel Francis (Aberavon) (Lab): I want to place on record my personal support for the Bill and that of the Welsh Affairs Committee, which I have the privilege of chairing.

In Committee, I presented several constructive proposals and criticisms on behalf of the Welsh Affairs Committee. We noted the Government's responses and it is important to acknowledge that we are taking an important—some may call it modest—step forward. Nevertheless, as a strong and long-standing supporter of democratic devolution, I believe that it is a critical step forward for the people of Wales. I am proud on behalf of not only the Welsh Affairs Committee but my constituency and the people of Wales to say that the Bill constitutes a major step for democracy in Wales and in the whole of Britain.

Huw Irranca-Davies: Does my hon. Friend accept that, when one is attacked on the one hand for not going far enough and on the other for going too far, it may be because we have got it right?

Dr. Francis: I think that I understand my hon. Friend and I suppose that I agree.

It is important to recognise at this vital stage that the Bill was a Labour manifesto commitment that we are now fulfilling. I am delighted, on behalf of the Welsh Affairs Committee, to support it.

9.29 pm

David T.C. Davies: The Secretary of State began his speech with the bizarre accusation that the Conservative party is trying to undermine devolution or prevent it from working. Ever since the referendum, the Conservative party has worked flat out to ensure that an institution with which we did not especially agree works as well as possible for Wales. That is why we got involved in the Welsh Assembly and why Conservative Assembly Members work so assiduously to scrutinise legislation in Committees and in the Chamber. That is why we hold surgeries every week, and why we raise issues on behalf of our constituents at local and national level—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. Gentleman of what I have said to other hon. Members? We really must concentrate on the content of the Bill on Third Reading.

David T.C. Davies: Very well, Madam Deputy Speaker, but one of the major effects of the Bill is the change in the voting system that has been proposed because Labour Members have said that they are tired of Members who represent regions popping up in constituencies and opening up offices to compete with other Labour Assembly Members for their work. That is what my Conservative colleagues in the Welsh Assembly have done, and I am very proud of them. It is partly because we have worked extremely hard to make devolution work for the people in Wales that Labour Members have become frustrated and have had to use their strength in Parliament to change the voting system in a way that they know will hinder the Opposition parties. I represent a constituency in the Welsh Assembly, but I have had Assembly Members from other parties, including the Liberal Democrats, claiming to be the Assembly Member for Monmouth. In reality, if the constituency Member is doing their job properly, they have nothing to worry about.

The Secretary of State for Wales undermined his own argument when he admitted that he would never hold a referendum unless he thought that he could win it. We argue that the Government should hold a referendum and let us see what the people of Wales have to say. I am not afraid to put these matters to the people of Wales, even if the Secretary of State is. We know why the people would vote against giving any further powers to the Assembly. Contrary to what the Secretary of State says, we have longer hospital waiting lists there, and fewer schools, and higher council taxes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. The hon. Gentleman has been asked once to confine his remarks to the content of the Bill. I hope that he will do that; otherwise I shall insist that he does.

David T.C. Davies: We will vote against the Bill tonight not because we do not want devolution to work but because we want to reflect the views of the people of Wales. Even the Secretary of State for Wales has admitted tonight that those people would not be in favour of giving the Assembly any further powers.

Tomorrow will be an historic day in Wales, and I shall be down there with my colleagues—yes, in a building that we might not particularly have wanted in the first place—making sure that devolution works.

Albert Owen (Ynys Môn) (Lab): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Monmouth (David T.C. Davies), who leads so graciously with his chin on so many issues. He talks about a referendum, but we know that he would vote against it. He has said tonight that he is pro-devolution, yet he is going to vote against that, too.

I happen to agree with a lot of what the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) said, but we think that things should move at a different pace. That is the difference between us. In 1997, I was happy to work with many pro-devolution parties to get the Assembly up and running, and it was a great tribute to the cross-party coalition that that happened. The referendum result in my constituency reflected the national picture—51 per cent. were in favour and 49 per cent. against, which is why we have to be a little cautious about the pace at which we move forward. I engage a great deal with my constituents and I do not think that they have the appetite for the great change that the Liberal Democrats and, certainly, Plaid Cymru want—namely, total independence. Plaid Cymru wants to use the Assembly to move towards full independent status. I want the Welsh Assembly to work for the people of Ynys Môn, and I believe that the Bill is pitched just about right in that regard.

I am proud to follow a strong tradition, along with my hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Nia Griffith). Our predecessors, Jim Griffiths and Cledwyn Hughes, were the real architects of devolution, and they knew what was acceptable to the people of Wales at the time. They set up the Welsh Office and introduced the biggest pieces of legislation of the time to help the Welsh language. I remember talking to Cledwyn Hughes after the 1997 referendum debate. I thought that he would be very disappointed at what was on offer, but he said no, it was about right. It was enough, given the shock when we lost the referendum in 1979, and he felt that we had to move at an appropriate pace.

The Bill has three main parts. There is consensus on the part that separates the Executive from the corporate body of the Assembly. We all agree with that. My difficulty with the Conservatives' argument is that although, in Committee and on Report they said time and again that we should not amend an arrangement that was only a few years old, they agree with us on that aspect. Even the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) said tonight that we could have had a Bill dealing only with the separation of powers. The Conservatives really are confused about the Bill as a whole.

Then there is the banning of the dual mandate. That is confusing. Like the hon. Member for Monmouth, I do not get exercised about it, but I recall that when I was first elected a Member of Parliament, the Assembly Member who is now the leader of the Opposition in the Assembly did get exercised when a Conservative list Member used to claim to be the based Assembly Member in that constituency. That has changed a little. It does not really bother me, but it is confusing when losers under the first-past-the-post system become winners. I think it right to adjust the position. The Opposition's arguments about gerrymandering and rigging were unfounded—they had no evidence to support their claim that the measure would benefit the Labour party. I do not think that it will be of benefit, but I think that it will clarify the situation.

[Albert Owen]

The other main measure involves Orders in Council. On the eve of St David's day, I hope that one of the first Orders in Council from the Welsh Assembly will be for a public holiday in Wales. It would be very symbolic. I believe in enabling powers, and in working in partnership with the National Assembly. It is important for that young institution to produce positive measures that we can discuss and on which we can make progress.

I want devolution to move faster because I am a pro-devolutionist. I always have been, following a proud tradition in my constituency. However, I do not think that we should move too far ahead of the people in Wales. I think that the Bill has the balance about right. That is why, as a pro-devolutionist, I am proud to support pro-devolution measures—unlike the Conservatives, who claim to be pro-devolution but are prepared to vote against any pro-devolution measure at any stage in the House.

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I am sure that we are all looking forward to the end of this long groundhog day, so I shall be brief.

Ministers, I am sure, hope that the eventual passing of the Bill will be greeted in Wales with a Millennium stadium-style roar of approval, but I believe that it will be greeted with an empty millennium dome-style wall of silence and lack of interest. We should not forget that nearly two thirds of the Welsh electorate did not participate in the last Assembly elections two and a half years ago, and I see nothing in the Bill that will deal with that problem.

I want devolution to work. I am one of the Conservative Members who are open-minded about how the devolution settlement might be extended and deepened in years to come. What the people of Wales signed up to in the referendum, by the thinnest margins, was Executive devolution, not legislative devolution. What the Bill gives them is legislative devolution in all but name, through a piece of constitutional trickery. That is why, with a heavy heart, I shall vote against the Bill this evening. I want the Assembly to work—I want it to be an expression of a vibrant political culture in Wales. However, I consider the Bill to be deeply flawed.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): It gives me great pleasure to speak on Third Reading. I know that my predecessor James Griffiths, the first Secretary of State for Wales, would have been proud to see the Bill become law. He was very clear that there should be a Wales Office. He was also very clear that there should be a strong voice for Wales in the Cabinet. He was an enthusiastic advocate of devolution long before it became popular. At the same time, he did not want independence for Wales—he saw Wales as an integral part of the United Kingdom.

To me, the Bill represents an important step in bringing decision-making nearer to the people—the people who will be affected by the decisions. Given the increasing emphasis on globalisation, it is important for us to find the correct level for each type of collaboration and each type of legislation. I believe that the Bill brings power to a more appropriate level. At a European level, we can discuss issues such as the environment and working together to maintain decent working conditions and standards of living for workers across the European Union, while ensuring that our own workers are not undercut.

In this place, we discuss issues appropriate to the UK as a nation, such as defence, finance and law and order. The Bill will enable the Assembly to have a much greater degree of flexibility—a flexibility that will allow it to reflect more truly in its legislation the concerns and wishes of the people of Wales. As I said, I see the Bill as an important step in bringing decision making closer to the people. We need to go further and to ensure that we listen more carefully to our town and community councils. We must renew and strengthen our community spirit and get more people involved in the decision-making process.

Although the list system has been much criticised, it does give a much louder voice to those voters whose parties do not do so well under the first-past-the-post system. They have the Labour party to thank for that. The Assembly is a very representative body that reflects the diversity of community and politics in Wales. The Bill will give it greater opportunity to reflect the needs and wishes of the people of Wales. I look forward to attending the opening of the new Assembly building tomorrow, and I wish the Assembly as an institution a very successful future.

Adam Price: The hon. Member for Llanelli (Nia Griffith) is of course right—the Charter Secretary of State for Wales advocated the creation of a Welsh Office as early as 1946, I believe. Of course, it took almost 20 years to achieve that modest objective, and that is part of the problem that we as a nation have had to face, namely, the exasperating, almost glacial speed of political devolution.

Nia Griffith rose—

Adam Price: Time is short, so if the hon. Lady will forgive me I will not give way.

This Bill, like so many home rule Bills in our history, stands in a long line of half-measures and missed opportunities. Tom Ellis's home rule Bill, for example, was struck down by a Liberal Government and certainly was not given time or support. Such things have happened throughout our history. People sometimes speak of a slippery slope to independence, but the slope certainly is not slippery and it is always uphill. Every small step constitutes precious ground that those of us in the national movement, and devolutionists in other parties, have had to fight for every inch of the way.

Lord Morgan of Aberdyfi has pointed eloquently to the fact that it took some 70 to 80 years longer to establish a Welsh Office—in 1964—than it did to establish the Scotland Office. He said that that was a product of our being a conquered people. Only a Labour parliamentarian could say that without getting heckled, but there is probably something in what he says. Consider our history as a nation. In contrast with Scotland, we did not retain—in fact, we did not even have—modern institutions of civil society. We had an absentee aristocracy, followed by an absentee landlord and political class. Because of that, we have had to make these halting steps forward—steps that we see once again in this Bill.

I do not think that the Government have got the Bill just about right, but I do not think that they have got it totally wrong, either, which is why I will support Third Reading. If we had refused all along the crumbs and half-loaves that were sometimes given to us by the political establishment in this place, the Welsh nation would have withered on the vine. We have to accept that pragmatism—the accepting of sometimes deficient measures—is part of our history. However, I look forward to the day when Government of Wales Bills no longer echo in this Chamber and when the governance of Wales will not be a matter for debate in this neo-gothic monument. It will be a matter, entirely properly, for the people of Wales, and will be dealt with where it belongs—in the Senedd that will be symbolically opened tomorrow. One day, it will be open in earnest, and have all the powers that a Welsh nation with the right of self-determination will deserve.

The late Gwyn Alf Williams said that Wales as a nation had existed for almost 1,600 years, and that it was about time that we got the keys to our own front door. We are still waiting. The Government somehow suggest, through the post-referendum device, that Welsh democracy—and, by extension, even the Welsh nation itself—is not yet mature enough to have the full range of primary law-making powers. I reject that assertion. It is symptomatic of the strange position that Wales is in that one of the oldest nations in these islands and on this continent should be one of the youngest democracies. There is a contradiction and a tension there, and that is why I think that, in his heart of hearts, the Secretary of State does not believe his own assertion that the Bill, shot through with contradictions as it is, can resolve the national question that we in Wales have debated for so many generations. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman is also shot through with contradictions and tensions: he is certainly a complex political operator.

The Secretary of State said earlier that the matter has been resolved for a generation, but I think of a generation as lasting 20 years. I am not prepared to wait that long to get primary law-making powers in Wales—[Interruption.] He also said that no other party had delivered devolution for Wales. However, I thought that the referendum campaign was meant to be a collective enterprise that went beyond political party divisions. How easy will it be to resurrect that sense of collective endeavour, given the sectarian and partisan approach displayed even tonight by the Labour party and the Secretary of State?

We must recreate the national consensus created in 1997 so that we can make progress along the long and arduous path towards national self-determination. By their approach to the Bill, the Secretary of State and his colleagues have made that difficult task even more onerous. Unfortunately, that will be the badge of shame that he must carry.

Mr. David Jones: I shall be brief, as I know that time is short. The Bill is a huge missed opportunity. The Secretary of State said that it is intended to settle the devolution issue for a generation, but it will do nothing of the sort. What it has done is to sow seeds of constitutional strife that it will take the next Conservative Government to resolve.

Some elements of the Bill are laudable: I support them, and should have liked to do so wholeheartedly. First, the separation of the legislature from the Executive is manifestly desirable. The arrangement established by the original devolution settlement was wrong, and should have been rectified long ago. That is a laudable provision and I support it.

Similarly, if the Secretary of State had had sufficient courage to go to the people of Wales at this stage and ask them if they wanted more devolution and more primary powers, I would have had much more respect for his position. However, he did not do that; instead, he has resorted to an opaque and byzantine device that effectively gives primary powers to the people of Wales without prior consultation in a referendum. The Secretary of State will find that in years to come the people of Wales will grow to resent that. They will demand the right to state their position in a referendum, and I hope that they do it sooner rather than later. I also hope that at that stage the Secretary of State will listen to what they have to say and abide by their decision.

The Bill is flawed. As a matter of principle, I cannot possibly support it. Frankly, I find the position of Plaid Cymru and the Liberal Democrats accommodating in the extreme. They have compromised their principles, but the occupants of the Conservative Benches will not. For that reason, I shall vote against the Bill.

9.50 pm

Huw Irranca-Davies: I am pleased to speak towards the end of the very long process of our dealings with the Bill. I spoke on Second Reading, I spoke in Committee, and I am pleased to be here at the denouement. I am also pleased to see that at the end of the long process of Welsh debate on what will become the Government of Wales Act, many English Members are gathering on the Benches here to see it through—[Interruption.] And Scottish and Northern Ireland Members, too.

I begin by congratulating fellow Members on the arduous journey of these debates, and on bringing the Bill to what I hope will be a successful conclusion, which we shall see in a few moments. I also thank the Chairman and the members of the Welsh Affairs Committee, who have contributed so strongly to the development of the Bill with their ideas. I want to mention the members of the Wales TUC and the CBI, whose support has undoubtedly—albeit on one small part in one clause—contributed significantly to ensuring that the voices not only of employers, but of employees and unions are more firmly represented in the Bill than has previously been the case in legislation. That recognises the good work that the Welsh Assembly has already done in dealing with the affairs of business, and also puts it there right in front of us so that there can be no retreat.

The hon. Member for Carmarthen, East and Dinefwr (Adam Price) mentioned that we now have half a loaf—but my reading of the situation is that at the moment half a loaf is what is being demanded. There is no stomach for anything more than what is on offer. However, this is still a process, and there are still questions. Devolution was never a moment in time, or a definitive statement followed by a stop.

What is in the Bill undoubtedly will not satisfy some Members here because it does not go far enough for them. For others, it goes much too far, and they would like us to roll back the whole thing. I have been speaking to my constituents since the start of the process, at the time of Second Reading and all the way through. I have to say that there are not many people knocking on my surgery door to ask about the Bill—and when we do get into discussion about it, there is no great appetite for running headlong into further referendums and transfers of primary powers. However, what there is—and what the Bill in its present form recognises—is the fact that the Welsh Assembly Government are starting to deliver well. They are starting to be recognised more and more by the Welsh people for the way in which they connect with communities, consult and, at a very local level, do far more than the old Welsh Office used to do. That is good, but there is no appetite to rush headlong any further.

The three main components of the Bill, and the split between the Executive and legislative powers, seem to have caused no great difficulty for most people. By and large, that was one of the easiest areas to take through. I think that all of us, or at least many of us—everyone apart from the Conservatives—are looking forward to maximum use of the Orders in Council, and to seeing that system working. It is a good stage development of the devolution process. Labour Members recognise that the Bill does not go as far as some people want, but we think that what we now have with the Orders in Council, and what we will be voting on in a few minutes, is exactly what the Welsh people are now willing to accept.

The most contentious area of all is the idea of standing as a first-past-the-post candidate in one seat, losing and then, the following morning, being resurrected as a regional Member. We will never agree on that across these Benches, but—as we have said throughout progress on the Bill—it does not seem right, in terms of natural justice, that there should be a Lazarus-like resurrection of candidates the morning after they have been soundly defeated. We will not agree on that, but we think that the changes are appropriate.

I also wish to put firmly to bed the idea, which has been frequently thrown at us, that the most contentious proposal has anything to do with gerrymandering. We have shown time and again that—[Interruption.] As has just been said from a sedentary position, it is not partisan, because Labour Members will be as likely to lose out as Opposition Members. I do not wish to regurgitate the arguments from Committee, but the changes are to no one party's particular advantage.

I welcome the approach being taken by the Liberal Democrats and Plaid, because even though they are not happy with everything in the Bill, they have said that they will go out and try to make it work. Regrettably, that is in stark contrast to the major Opposition party. At the beginning of this process, we hoped that the Conservatives would say that although they had difficulties with some of the details, they supported in principle the idea of staged devolution at a pace suitable to the Welsh people. Unless Opposition Members change their views in the next few minutes, it seems that only one party in Wales will, once again, nail its colours firmly to the anti-devolution mast. That is a matter for great regret because, regardless of the difficulties with the Bill, it would be great to be able to say with one voice that we were all united.

Mrs. Gillan: I reiterate that it is with heavy hearts that we will vote against the Bill. We are not prepared to support devolution by taking scraps that fall from the Labour table, as the Liberal Democrats and Plaid obviously are. In voting in that way, we will vote in the interests of the Assembly, the people of Wales and Wales itself. To represent our position in any other way would be dishonest.

Huw Irranca-Davies: I have been called worse things in my time and probably will be again. However, whether the Bill is scraps from the table or half a loaf, what is on offer tonight is exactly what the Welsh people are demanding. It is a huge regret that at the last minute of the eleventh hour the Conservative party—the main Opposition—should set its face firmly against devolution. The Conservatives cannot seriously hold their heads up high tomorrow. They cannot ever again say that they support devolution. They would be laughing stocks if they tried to maintain that position.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Jessica Morden), I take particular pride in and satisfaction from the fact that new clause 12—which is unique to this Bill and has been incorporated into it through the Government's acceptance and with cross-party support—will strengthen the links not only with employers' federations and small and large businesses, but with our union colleagues. That will be a major advance in the Assembly's existing arrangements. In major decisions on environmental, social and economic well-being, there will be a duty for the Assembly to consult employers and employees.

That is a huge move forward and I regret that this evening the Conservatives will be voting not only against devolution and the principles of devolution, but against new clause 12 which gives a voice to employers and employees. Alone in the House, the Conservative party is setting its face against the CBI, the TUC and devolution in Wales. That is remarkable and I look forward to Conservative Members justifying it not only to their constituents but to the head of the CBI in Wales and the head of the TUC.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Housing (North Dorset)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.——[Mr. Cawsey]

10.15 pm

Mr. Robert Walter (North Dorset) (Con): This debate concerns a serious situation in my constituency with regard to the future provision of housing. It exemplifies a conflict between existing structure plans and the yet-to-be-determined regional spatial strategy. It also exemplifies a dilemma because in the north and west of my constituency, which is part of the North Dorset district, the policies seem to be different from those in the eastern part of my constituency, in the East Dorset district.

In the east, the debate on the proposed regional spatial strategy seems to centre on eating up more of the green belt, whereas it appears that the existing policy framework in the north, and the development of what is today a series of vibrant market towns, is being frustrated by the Government office for the south-west and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister.

Planning, and the calling in of planning applications by the Secretary of State, is obviously a serious matter. It is not my purpose to discuss the merits of these particular applications. That has been performed according to the due democratic process, and if there is a public inquiry, they will be examined there. I want to examine what is behind the decisions to call in the applications, and more particularly the effect that that is having in my constituency and the implications for the future of housing provision there.

The Government office for the south-west has called in two planning applications that were submitted to North Dorset district council for the Secretary of State's own determination, which would follow a public local inquiry. The main reason given is that the proposal may conflict with national policies on important matters. The planning applications that I refer to are in the town of Shaftesbury, which was recently described by one property magazine as one of the 10 most desirable places to live in England. I do not know whether that was because the local Member of Parliament lives in the town, but I suspect that other factors were involved.

In that call-in, the inspector will consider the extent to which the proposed developments accord with RPG10, the regional planning guidance for the south-west; the extent to which they are consistent with the adopted Dorset, Poole and Bournemouth joint structure plan and the adopted North Dorset-wide local plan; and the extent to which the applications may prejudice the emerging regional spatial strategy and the consequences for the appropriate scale and distribution of housing development in North Dorset, including in Shaftesbury.

The two applications are for outline planning permission to develop land for residential and mixed-use purposes. A total of 190 units of affordable housing would be offered in these schemes. They will also offer many community and transport facilities, a cycle-way, pedestrian infrastructure and the expansion of education facilities. The schemes are consistent with the existing local plan and the structure plan and have already been tested by public inquiry.

North Dorset faces serious problems with the decline in its traditional farming economy. Younger people are leaving the area and there is a growing and large affordability gap for the indigenous population who want to live locally. House prices are rising fast and all the market towns in North Dorset require regeneration.

The call-in raises important questions and serious matters of principle. The case has been called in ahead of the regional spatial strategy—in other words, in advance of any approved regional policy. The regional economic strategy, which has been approved, states that affordable housing is one of the key elements in building the local economy. The provisions made by the Housing Corporation and the district's own housing needs survey show that the applications are consistent with the predictions of need—in fact, they fall far short of the needs identified for affordable housing.

The policy of the regional spatial strategy and Government policy in RPG10 are clear that the main focus of development should be on the principal urban areas, with some growth in other designated centres for growth. Development outside those areas should be smaller scale to meet local needs. Unfortunately, market towns in North Dorset have not been designated as areas for growth; it is self-evident, however, that the market towns need a certain amount of growth to remain sustainable. In the rural White Paper, the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs acknowledges that towns in rural, coastal and coalfield regions have serious economic difficulties with the loss of younger people, low wages and heavy dependency on primary industries such as agriculture, which causes social and economic difficulties where there is a large change in those industries. The White Paper sees market towns as a focus for growth in areas that need regeneration.

North Dorset district council has successfully set up community planning partnerships to assist the regeneration of the market towns. The partnerships have ensured a high degree of local involvement with and support for the development schemes. The White Paper states:

> "We want people to be able to live in the communities where they grew up. In the South West there is a severe shortage of affordable housing for local people. We are doubling the Housing Corporation rural programme to provide 3,000 homes a year nationally in small rural settlements and we will provide more affordable homes as part of mixed developments in market towns and villages."

The district council estimates that about 600 affordable homes are needed each year to meet the needs of the area and wants to focus development in its market towns. That is in line with the spirit of Government policy, but the current mismatch of the regional spatial strategy, the rural White Paper and the regional economic strategy leave Dorset people the losers.

The letter that the Government office for the south-west sent to my district council on 4 October came as a shock to the local community. It states:

> "The first Secretary of State's policy on call-ins is set out in" a statement made by the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), then a Minister of State at the Department for the Environment Transport and the Regions, on

> "16 June 1999 in reply to a Parliamentary Question tabled by Mr. Bill Michie" who at that time was the Member of Parliament for Sheffield, Heeley. Mr. Michie's question was:

[Mr. Robert Walter]

"To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about his policy on calling in planning applications under section 77 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990."

The right hon. Member for Sheffield, Central replied on behalf of the Secretary of State, saying:

"My right hon. Friend's general approach, like that of previous Secretaries of State, is not to interfere with the jurisdiction of local planning authorities unless it is necessary to do so. Parliament has entrusted them with responsibility for day-to-day planning control in their areas. It is right that, in general, they should be free to carry out their duties responsibly, with the minimum of interference.

There will be occasions, however, when my right hon. Friend may consider it necessary to call in the planning application to determine himself, instead of leaving the decision to the local planning authority.

His policy is to be very selective about calling in planning applications. He will, in general, only take this step if planning issues of more than local importance are involved. Such cases may include, for example, those which, in his opinion:

may conflict with national policies on important matters"—[Official Report, 16 June 1999; Vol. 138, c. 333.]

At the moment, there is not a national policy in that area. Some cases may, according to the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Central, have significant effects beyond their immediate locality, but there is no clear indication that that is so. Some cases may give rise to substantial regional or national controversy, but I believe that the only national controversy is the one that I am raising in the House tonight. According to the right hon. Gentleman, some cases may raise significant architectural/urban design issues—that is clearly not the case in North Dorset—or may involve the interests of national security or of foreign Governments.

The application has been called in. I quote again from the letter:

"On the information so far available to the First Secretary of State the following are matters which he particularly wishes to be informed about . . . :

(i) the extent to which the proposed developments are in accordance with regional planning guidance for the south west (RPG 10), including guidance on rural areas . . .

(ii) the extent to which the proposed developments are consistent with policy advice in the adopted (2000) Dorset, Poole and Bournemouth Joint Structure Plan and the adopted North Dorset District-Wide Local Plan . . .

(iii) the extent to which the applications may prejudice the emerging Regional Spatial Strategy . . . and the consequences for the appropriate scale and distribution of housing development in North Dorset including Shaftesbury".

The key factor is the possibility that the application may prejudice the emerging regional spatial strategy. It is only emerging—it has not yet been agreed. Does that mean that we have to stop? In my constituency, these towns need development. We are not talking about areas that have been ignored. The South West of England Regional Development Agency published a document entitled "Raising the Game" in which it looked at key economic performance indicators for those areas, including the market towns in my constituency. The percentage of the working-age population with NVQ level 4 qualifications and above is the highest in the south-west region at 30.5 per cent. The percentage of people with NVQ level 3 qualifications and above is 54.7 per cent.—more than half the population—compared with the national average of 45 per cent.

The average employment rate in my constituency is one of the highest in the area at 82.5 per cent., compared with the national average of less than 75.5 per cent. It is a vibrant economic area, but it desperately needs affordable housing. The provision of such housing is the highest priority in the Dorset community strategy, which has been endorsed by the Dorset strategic partnership that brings together all the local authorities in the country. The sustainability of the market towns is dependent on a certain amount of development through which districts can lever in affordable housing and economic development. The Government are calling for a concerted effort from local authorities to boost the development of housing to meet the urgent need for more dwellings, so it is ironic that the Secretary of State, via the Government office, has called in those planning applications in North Dorset that, together, would provide about 670 dwellings, of which 180 would be affordable homes.

The sites in question provide the bulk of a major allocation for the town of Shaftesbury, as proposed in the North Dorset local plan, which was adopted in 2003. The strategy behind that plan and the reason for the allocation were scrutinised in the local plan inquiry in 1999. In reaching his conclusions, the local plan inspector noted that he had considered the objections made in the light of PPG3 on housing, which was published in March 2000 while he was writing his report on the objections to the local plan. The plan conformed with the adopted structure plan and regional planning guidance to 2011. Although the Government office raised concerns about the allocation at the modification stage, it did not pursue them or prevent adoption of the plan.

In accordance with Government guidance, the prospective developers of the Shaftesbury site undertook a major consultation using resources provided by the Prince's Foundation to hold a three stage "Enquiry by Design" event, which involved the local community and a wide range of stakeholders.

Planning applications were submitted alongside a detailed environmental impact assessment, and the applications were again subject to major public consultation and detailed scrutiny. The applications were supported by the town council, the local community partnership and, most importantly, the Campaign to Protect Rural England, as the site is surrounded by the Cranborne Chase and West Wiltshire area of outstanding natural beauty and is clearly visible from a significant National Trust property at Melbury Beacon.

Together, the applications will contribute not only the 180 new affordable dwellings, but a new bus service to the development, new community facilities in the form of a community hall, open space and more allotments, and major financial contributions to a number of other facilities in the town that were required under the council's planning obligations. Without the contributions that the development will make, many of these facilities may founder, as the development comprises more than half of all the development proposed in the town up to 2011.

I must ask the Minister to rescind the call-in on the Shaftesbury applications. I urge him to understand the grave concerns about the seemingly heavy-handed approach of the Government office for the south-west and the Deputy Prime Minister towards development in rural areas. As least until there is more certainty regarding the regional spatial strategy, I ask the Minister to adopt a more lenient approach to development in districts such as North Dorset.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Phil Woolas): I congratulate the hon. Member for North Dorset (Mr. Walter) on raising an important issue for his constituency in such a logical and professional manner. I will use the time at my disposal to try to answer the points that he made and to explain our policy and how we may move forward.

The hon. Gentleman's concern about housing is shared by others who have written to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and raised questions about housing in North Dorset. Several have questioned the Secretary of State's decision last October to call in planning applications for residential development at Shaftesbury, which I know to be one of the most beautiful parts of our country.

Although I welcome the opportunity to discuss housing provision in North Dorset, I cannot comment, as the hon. Gentleman will understand, on the merits or otherwise of the specific proposals, which will, as he says, be the subject of a public local inquiry later this year, and I cannot prejudice the Secretary of State's impartiality. However, the debate is timely, as last December the Government gave their response to the Barker review.

We announced a commitment to increase the rate of house building from 150,000 per year at present to 200,000 by 2016, and to increase affordable housing for ownership and rent by a new partnership with the private sector to promote shared equity. The Government have just consulted, as has been mentioned, on new planning policy for housing—draft planning policy statement 3—on delivering infrastructure using a planning gain supplement and on a new draft code for sustainable homes to improve the energy efficiency of new homes.

Draft planning policy statement 3 sets out the Government's key objectives for planning for housing to ensure that everyone has the opportunity of living in a decent home that they can afford, in a community where they want to live. To achieve this objective, the Government are seeking to ensure that a wide choice of housing types is available for both affordable and market housing to meet the needs of all members of the community. We are seeking a better balance between housing demand and supply in every housing market, and to improve affordability where necessary and create sustainable, inclusive and mixed communities in all areas.

As well as being attractive, safe and designed to a high quality, developments should be located in areas with good access to jobs, key services and infrastructure. Now we start to understand the problem. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has as its key objective sustainable communities in all regions of the country, and this debate is an excellent opportunity to reinforce that commitment. The current regional spatial strategy for the south-west, RPG10, focuses development on the region's principal urban areas, with some growth at other designated centres for growth, which includes the region's main towns and cities. RPG10 advises that development outside those areas should be on a smaller scale to meet local needs. The emerging review of the regional spatial strategy, which the South West regional assembly is considering, seeks to continue and reinforce this direction while increasing overall levels of housing delivery across the region in order to meet growth needs and address the affordability problems that I have described.

I know that there is an important question about what rate of housing development is appropriate in North Dorset to meet local needs. The Dorset structure plan set a rate some time ago of approximately 335 dwellings a year. That requirement is long overdue for review, and I understand that the emerging regional spatial strategy currently anticipates a much lower rate of 220 dwellings a year by 2026. Some say that that represents a major slow-down of development, limits the scope for affordable housing and threatens to put market towns in the district into recession. Others say that maintaining such high rates of housing development only sustains high rates of car commuting and provides limited benefits to local people.

What are the possible solutions to that dilemma? I believe it important to look at bespoke solutions to issues and problems in rural communities rather than treating growth as a one-size-fits-all solution, be it North Dorset or North Cornwall. The issue is about understanding our communities' needs and how our communities work. As the hon. Gentleman has acknowledged, inward migration is a main component of population growth in North Dorset, as it is in the south-west as a whole. Gathering evidence and understanding local housing markets is a key step in ensuring that there is an appropriate mix of housing to meet local needs, including the important issue of affordable housing. As far as rates of housing development are concerned, there clearly needs to be a proper judgment in relation to demand and supply within the housing market area consistent with our desire to promote a sustainable pattern development for the region.

The regional spatial strategy will set that balance with a planning framework for a sustainable pattern of development for the south-west, and in so doing it will set rates of housing development for North Dorset looking forward to 2026. The Government's commitment to tackling housing supply, to the provision of more affordable housing and to reforms to the planning system equips local communities with the tools to focus on solutions tailored to local needs.

What are the Government doing? We are keen to increase the supply of housing and to address the problems of affordability. It is clear that there still needs to be substantial housing in the small towns and villages of the region with a focus on delivering more affordable housing. However, it is also important that the south-west owns the agenda—if I can put it that way, Mr. Deputy Speaker—and seeks its own solutions. Once a draft of the regional spatial strategy is submitted to the Secretary of State, an examination in public before an independent panel will examine the evidence around housing provision in North Dorset and the rural areas of the region.

The regional spatial strategy will provide rates of housing development for each planning authority in the region. Most importantly, the strategy will be prepared in harness with strategies for housing investment, the environment and the region's economic growth. Together, those measures will provide local communities with a clear strategic context.

I welcome the way in which North Dorset district council is helping to lead a housing market assessment for the wider housing market area in partnership with other local authorities in Dorset, and I am sure that that will go a long way to providing a robust and comprehensive evidence base on which to understand local needs.

Draft PPS3 suggests how local planning authorities might use their local development frameworks to set the balance of different household types to be provided across the plan area. Those measures, along with others, are intended to strengthen the ability of North Dorset, and of every local community, better to meet its housing needs.

Turning to our package of investment in housing, I am extremely proud of the increased resources that the Government have provided for more affordable housing. We have increased spending on new affordable homes to £2 billion in 2007–08—more than double the 1997 level. The region's No. 1 priority is the provision of more affordable housing to help to improve the balance of its housing markets.

I look forward to the report this spring by the affordable rural housing commission, which the Government have set up to investigate the issues surrounding the provision of affordable housing in rural areas. However, in recognition of the increasingly acute affordable housing issues in the south-west following the 2004 spending review, we have already allocated the south-west the largest increase of the English regions—up from £137 million in 2005–06 to £203 million in 2007–08. That is a 48 per cent. increase.

Final details of the Housing Corporation's 2006 to 2008 programme will be announced shortly, but I can say that in the market area that includes the hon. Gentleman's constituency, it proposes to allocate more than £30 million in 2006 to 2008. Moreover, the south-west housing body has set a target to provide at least 800 homes in the smallest rural settlements, taking an estimated 11 per cent. of the total programme, with a further £85 million intended to be invested in other settlements in rural areas such as market and county towns.

My Department has as its key objective sustainable communities in all regions. The hon. Gentleman, with obvious commitment to his constituency, has rightly provided an opportunity to reinforce the Government's commitment to a better future for the south-west. I recognise the problem that he describes and hope that I have been able to explain the Government's policy, which recognises the dilemma that exists. I commend that policy to the House and look forward to further debates on the important issues that the hon. Gentleman raised.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Developing World (Good Governance)

1. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): What steps he is taking to promote good governance in the developing world; and if he will make a statement. [53958]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The ability of developing countries to eradicate poverty will depend greatly on good governance. DFID works with partner countries to help them to promote safety and security, to encourage investment and growth, to improve public services and to build greater accountability, but, ultimately, developing countries themselves have to take responsibility for improving governance.

Mr. Amess: What assessment has the Secretary of State made of the American millennium challenge account, which seeks to promote good governance by directing aid towards Governments who govern justly, try to promote economic freedom and govern in the interests of their people?

Hilary Benn: That very much reflects an American approach, which is to impose a number of requirements to enable countries to get access to the millennium challenge account funding. One consequence of that has been that the account has found it very difficult to spend money. As donors take decisions about what we do, we have to make a judgment that balances progress—because it is direction of travel that really matters—against ensuring that our money is not used corruptly or goes to purposes for which it is not intended. We make a different assessment and do it in a different way, but I think that we are all trying to achieve the same objective.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): The Secretary of State will be aware that good governance is essential for good economic management and encouraging the development of the country. On several trips to African countries, Opposition and Government MPs have stated to me that they are interested in ensuring that the budgetary process is transparent and that they wish to follow the money. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that is essential and does he have any ideas about how we could encourage African parliamentarians in that process?

Hilary Benn: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend. That is why part of DFID's programme of work is to provide support to parliamentarians to improve accountability and scrutiny of public expenditure, working with public accounts committees in several African countries and helping to strengthen national audit functions, which allow expenditure to be assessed independently. I pay tribute to the work that organisations such as the Westminster Foundation for Democracy and the Parliamentary Network on the World Bank are doing. We should discuss among ourselves what more we might be able to do as a country, and as parliamentarians in this House, to work with colleagues in other countries to help them to build their capacity and to share experiences.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): In respect of good governance, can the Secretary of State reassure the House that his Department is not becoming a respectable front for lax and unacceptable practices by other Departments? I expect that he will be aware that Oxfam today published a report showing that a UK subsidiary based in South Africa has been exporting military equipment to Uganda—about whose Government the Secretary of State has expressed serious concerns—thereby bypassing normal export approval processes required in the UK. Can he assure the House that the Government's welcome words about an ethical dimension to the export of military equipment will be applied in practice across all Government Departments?

Hilary Benn: I am aware of the report in today's press. The first thing to say is that were BAE Systems in the UK to have taken part in any deal, that would have been caught by the UK's trade controls. Subsidiaries cannot always operate entirely outside the UK controls—it depends on the circumstances. On the other hand, we have to recognise that exports from South Africa to another African country, with no UK involvement, are rightly a matter for the South African Government, not for the Government of the United Kingdom. The truth is that it depends on the circumstances and on the nature of the subsidiary and the extent to which it is controlled by the company in the UK.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend comment on the governance, good or indifferent, of Sudan? Following his visit to Darfur last week, will he comment on the welfare of the people in the camps? I am particularly concerned about the welfare of women, who frequently cannot leave the camps because of the fear of being raped.

Hilary Benn: I had a conversation on that very matter with a group of women in Abu Shouk camp when I was in Darfur last week. Overall, conditions in the camps are much better than they were two years ago because of the huge international humanitarian effort. However, security outside the camps is deteriorating, which affects women who have to go out to collect firewood. I heard complaints about a lack of help and support to protect them while they do that. Jan Pronk and the new African Union force commander, Major-General Ihekire, confirmed to me that security in Darfur has deteriorated since my last visit there in June. That is why the decision that we anticipate that the African Union will take in the next two weeks to ask the United Nations mission to take over the African Union mission is so important. More troops and a stronger mandate are needed to provide protection while the parties to the conflict in Abuja get around to negotiating a peace deal. It has been going on for two years and they have not done that yet. The international community is paying the cost.

The message that I gave last week, and that the Foreign Secretary conveyed when he was in Abuja and spoke to those taking part in the peace talks, was that we have to do a peace deal now because it is the only way that those people will go home.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): I support the idea that the right hon. Member for West Dunbartonshire (Mr. McFall) proposed and we welcome the Secretary of State's decision to reduce British budgetary support to the Government of Uganda because of the President's failure to adhere to the principles of good governance and show respect for human rights. How did the Secretary of State respond to the Ugandan President's intemperate letter in which he complained that British aid was a "paternalistic arrangement", which held his country captive in a "beggar relationship"? Did he make it clear that we have every right to say how and where hard-earned British taxpayers' aid money should be spent and under what terms and conditions it should be disbursed?

Hilary Benn: I did indeed receive a letter last year from the President of Uganda. In correspondence and in the last conversation that I had with him in Malta at the Commonwealth Heads of Government conference, we made it clear that we will make our decisions on the basis of our assessments. Concerns about governance and especially the locking up of Kizza Besigye, the Opposition candidate in the presidential election, although he was subsequently released, led me to reallocate £15 million to helping the humanitarian situation in the north of the country, which, as the hon. Gentleman knows, is acute. We have retained £5 million and nothing will deflect us from taking the right decisions.

Mr. Mitchell: Is the Secretary of State aware that we also support his decision to reduce British aid to the Ethiopian Government? The Ethiopian Prime Minister's attitude to legitimate opposition was to gun down protesters on the streets of Addis Ababa. Does the right hon. Gentleman regret the Prime Minister's decision to include the Ethiopian Prime Minister in his Commission for Africa and to fête him at the launch of its report?

Hilary Benn: No, I do not regret that.

Mr. Mitchell: Why?

Hilary Benn: I shall explain. One should judge our development partners by what they do, and until the moment of the elections in June last year—the Commission for Africa concluded its work in March when the report was published; the hon. Gentleman must get the time scale right—the election was, in the historical context of Ethiopia, relatively free and fair and the Opposition won many seats. Subsequently, there were difficulties on the streets, people were shot dead and those who had won the seats were locked up. That is a breach of the principles on which our relationship is based. Having said that, Britain does not propose to walk away from people who are poor. That is why, like other donors, I am considering ways in which we can continue to provide help with water, sanitation and education. The people should not be punished for bad governance in their country.

Afghanistan

2. Dr. Roberta Blackman-Woods (City of Durham) (Lab): If he will make a statement on aid to Afghanistan. [53959]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): At the London conference on Afghanistan at the end of January, the Prime Minister signed a 10-year development partnership agreement with President Karzai, reaffirming the United Kingdom's long-term commitment to Afghanistan. That includes £330 million of development assistance over the next three years, as part of the overall UK pledge of £500 million to help reduce poverty, improve security and governance, and tackle the opium industry.

Dr. Blackman-Woods: Following the London conference on Afghanistan, what action is the Department taking to focus attention on achieving the millennium development goals not only in Afghanistan but throughout Asia?

Mr. Thomas: One of the most encouraging aspects of the London conference on Afghanistan was the scale of the continuing international commitment to that country. Some $10.5 billion was pledged for Afghanistan for the coming years. That will help the Afghan Government to continue their programme of investing in basic resources, improving the number of functioning health clinics, rebuilding more schools and getting more teachers for them and more children back in them.

My hon. Friend and other hon. Members may know that we are hosting a conference on the millennium development goals in Asia next week, with several senior Ministers from Asian countries coming to discuss progress and the nature of the remaining challenges.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Will the Minister explain in more detail how the alternative livelihoods programme is to be delivered in Helmand? How many UK-based staff are going to be involved? Will it be delivered through United Nations agencies, international non-governmental organisations such as Oxfam and Save the Children, or local non-governmental organisations? What are the benchmarks for success? What is the time scale involved? May we have more information about the alternative livelihoods programme in Helmand?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman will know that the progress that we make on alternative livelihoods will inevitably depend on the security situation in Helmand and more generally, and on the ability of our development partners to work safely on the ground. He will also be aware, from his previous visits to the region and his former role as the Chairman of the International Development Committee, of the work that we have done on alternative livelihoods in other areas, encouraging access to micro-finance and the establishment of elected community development councils, and giving grants to those councils to spend on projects that people at the grass roots think are important, such as irrigation projects, roads and bridges. The progress that we make on the alternative livelihoods programme in Helmand will inevitably depend on the security situation there.

East Africa

3. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): What discussions he has had with countries in east Africa in receipt of UK aid about the eradication of corruption. [53960]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): Corruption is a serious problem in much of Africa, and it is the poor who suffer from it most. DFID and other donors regularly discuss action to reduce corruption with east African governments. In Tanzania and Uganda, the UK is supporting improvements in public financial management and greater accountability to Parliament and civil society. I had a frank discussion with President Kibaki of Kenya about corruption during my visit in January. Since then, following the publication of the Githongo dossier, three senior Ministers have stepped down due to unprecedented public pressure.

Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend has been suitably forthright this morning about the need to take action against corruption, and he has identified the problems that exist in Kenya and Uganda in his responses to other questions. The Museveni regime has become progressively more corrupt, and the Kibaki regime in Kenya has, sadly, not lived up to the promises of corruption eradication on which it campaigned before the last presidential election. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House how he intends to bring proper pressure to bear on those Governments while protecting the interests of the poorest people in those countries who still need British assistance?

Hilary Benn: First, by ensuring that the funds that we give are used in an appropriate way. We take great care to do that, which is why we do not provide direct budget support to Kenya. Secondly, it is right that we continue to support a process of change in those countries to create the institutions that could be used to fight corruption, if there is the political will to do so. The institutions on their own will not work, if there is no political will to make them work. What has happened in Kenya over the past month is significant because domestic Kenyan politics are leading the change, precisely because people feel disappointed. My hon. Friend is right to say that we must continue to find ways to support the poor people in those countries. Those who say that British aid to Kenya should be withdrawn completely because of the problems there are fundamentally mistaken, because that would result in punishing the poor people for failures that are not of their own making.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): I agree that funds should continue to go to Kenya, but does the Secretary of State accept that the welcome arrest of three senior Ministers is only a small step in the right direction? Is he quite happy that the Government have struck the right balance between putting real pressure on the Kenyan Government to end corruption and avoiding adversely affecting the livelihoods of ordinary people there?

Hilary Benn: In the end, it is for the House to judge whether the Government have struck the right balance, but I hope that we have. We have been resolute in making clear our concern about corruption. As I said a moment ago, I did so very directly in my recent discussions with President Kibaki. However, the most important voice that should be heard loud and clear is that of the Kenyan people, and the unprecedented events surrounding the resignation of the three Ministers is a direct result of such pressure. We need to keep that up. As I said in answer to the first question today, good governance and fighting corruption are down to the countries themselves, and the more pressure there is from within, the greater the chance of resolving the problems.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend knows, a great deal of the money that we give to Kenya goes in through organisations such as the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria. I am worried about the disbursement of the fund's money to support HIV/AIDS orphans in Kenya. What is my right hon. Friend doing, in addition to arranging our own bilateral aid, to ensure that those multilateral organisations also deal with the problems of governance, and that they arrange for effective disbursement so that the money gets through to the people who need it?

Hilary Benn: We work very hard with the Global Fund to ensure that the money and the increasing support that the Government have put in are used to good effect. Kenya is one of the countries where there have been difficulties in making the money work. Therefore, we have been supporting a programme with the Global Fund and UNAIDS to find out what the obstacles are and to ensure that that resource—that money—is delivered to change people's lives.

While we are talking about Kenya, an immediate concern is the drought, because that will affect a lot of people, including those who have been orphaned, not least because in many cases they have lost means of support. I can tell the House today that I have decided to allocate a further £15 million in response to the latest assessment of the drought in Kenya, because there is an urgent need to get more help to people who are at risk of not having enough to eat, and therefore of dying.

Mark Simmonds (Boston and Skegness) (Con): Corruption has not only robbed east Africa of resources, but exacerbated and perpetuated poverty. It hinders economic development, erodes faith in Governments and dissuades people from paying taxes. Significant progress in strengthening African nations' auditor-general capacities is urgently required. The Prime Minister has stated that aid will be linked to the elimination of corruption. What assessment has the Secretary of State made of a specific amount of British taxpayers' money allocated as aid funding that has been lost as leakage—not only to corruption, but to expenditure outside the social portfolios for which it was intended?

Hilary Benn: We have a series of procedures in place to ensure that that does not happen. I will happily give the hon. Gentleman, in the small number of cases where there have been problems, the details of what we have found and what we have done to deal with it. The way we approach the problem is, first, to make a proper assessment of the fiduciary risk; secondly, to choose how we will give our aid, in response to an assessment of the risk; and, thirdly, having made that decision, to ensure that the way the money is given is tracked carefully so that it can be accounted for.

I take with complete seriousness my responsibility in this office to ensure that every single penny in our aid programme, for which many people have campaigned and which many people support, goes for the purpose for which it is intended.

Jim Sheridan (Paisley and Renfrewshire, North) (Lab): As with east Africa, my right hon. Friend will be aware of the absolute corruption in Nigeria and the difficulties in that country with foreign oil workers being held captive and oil production being stopped. Can I ask him about the money that is being stolen from the people of Nigeria—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman and the Secretary of State that this question is about east Africa. We must move on.

Supermarket Produce

4. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): What discussions he has had with major supermarket chains on the promotion of produce from developing countries.

[53961]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development (Mr. Gareth Thomas): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has had several discussions with Asda, whose headquarters are in his constituency. Next month, he will be meeting with Tesco and Marks and Spencer, as well as Asda and other important supermarket supply chain participants, to discuss the opportunities that their procurement practices provide, potentially, for small farmers in developing countries. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I call the hon. Gentleman to ask his supplementary question, may I appeal to the House to keep things quieter? I need to hear the questioner, as does the Minister, and we need to hear the answer.

Dr. Pugh: Does the Minister acknowledge that corporate responsibility from the major retailers over their supply chain and marketing can deliver enormous benefits, just as corporate irresponsibility can do the opposite? Does he acknowledge that there is more that retailers and the Government can do?

Mr. Thomas: I accept entirely the hon. Gentleman's point. Together with the International Institute for Environment and Development and the Natural Resources Institute, and as a result of recommendations made by the Commission for Africa, we have launched this initiative to look with the major supermarkets at what more we can do collectively to open up opportunities for small-scale farmers in developing countries to source goods into the UK market.

Helen Jones (Warrington, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that, when we are encouraging supermarkets to promote more produce from the developing world, that has to be fairly traded produce? There is also a lot of work that needs to be done with consumers to encourage them to buy such produce and to help them to understand why we need to pay a fair price for those goods.

Mr. Thomas: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to make that point, particularly as Fairtrade fortnight is almost on us. I am sure that Members will have the opportunity up and down the country to contribute to consumer awareness. I pay special tribute to the Co-op Group, one of the leading UK supermarkets, which has led the way in the number of fair trade lines that it has offered. Other supermarkets are following in its wake and seeking to promote more fair trade lines. I welcome that, but, as my hon. Friend said, much more needs to be done.

Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): While the Minister seeks to develop local markets in niche products, will he be careful that we do not encourage air miles and food miles, which can be hugely destructive of the global economy, and that we do not pursue a laudable aim with the wrong method?

Mr. Thomas: The hon. Gentleman is right to add that cautionary note, which is why we work closely with other Departments that focus on such issues. We can do much more to encourage access to UK markets for small farmers' goods. That is why we are working closely with supermarkets and the Fairtrade Foundation, have pledged additional resources to them and are working with the Ethical Trading Initiative.

Palestinian Authority

5. Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): What plans he has to review UK aid to the Palestinian Authority in the light of the outcome of their elections; and if he will make a statement. [53962]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): The international community is united in its support for the Quartet statement of 30 January. Hamas needs to give up violence, recognise Israel and sign up to previous obligations on the peace process. Aid to the Palestinian territories will be reviewed against those principles. While the current caretaker Government are in place, the international community is examining closely what steps could help to stabilise their financial situation, as recommended by the Quartet. On Monday, the UK made £5 million available to the World Bank to transfer to Abu Mazen's interim Government. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I once again appeal for extraneous conversations to cease? International Development questions are as important as any other proceedings of the House today.

Mr. Dismore: Will my right hon. Friend make it an unambiguous precondition of continued UK aid to the Palestinian Authority that the Hamas Administration should recognise Israel, renounce violence and the Hamas-organised terror attacks that have killed 400 people and injured more than 2,400 others, and that Hamas disarms and accepts the terms of international agreements? Will he give the House an assurance that no EU or UK funding will be used to support in any way Hamas's extremist ideology and propaganda?

Hilary Benn: I can certainly give that assurance—no UK aid money will be used to support Hamas or the propaganda to which my hon. Friend refers. The international community is saying clearly that Hamas needs to take the steps set out in the Quartet statement. At the same time, everybody recognises that it is in nobody's interest that services to Palestinians—particularly poor Palestinians, who have suffered so much—should be removed because of the election process. The international community is currently grappling with that.

Zimbabwe

6. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): If he will make a statement on the humanitarian situation in Zimbabwe. [53963]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): Zimbabwe is a country in crisis. More than one fifth of all adults are HIV-positive, 3,000 people die of AIDS every week and 1.3 million children have been orphaned. Three million to 5 million Zimbabweans face food shortages in the "hungry" months leading up to the harvest. To make matters worse, in 2005, the Zimbabwean Government destroyed the homes and livelihoods of an estimated 700,000 people in "Operation Clean-Up". DFID will spend £38 million in 2005–06 to tackle shortage of food, help to deal with HIV/AIDS and provide support for orphans and vulnerable children.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for that full and factual answer. Does he go along with the United Nations, which believes that Zimbabwe is in meltdown? Not only are 700,000 people now dispossessed, but unemployment is at 80 per cent., and 70 per cent. of the population exist on one meal or less a day. What can this Government do to bring about change? How effective is the African peer review mechanism in getting Robert Mugabe to improve his human rights?

Hilary Benn: I share the hon. Gentleman's assessment of the current crisis in Zimbabwe. It has the fastest-collapsing economy in the world and is a testament to monumentally bad governance. We have discussed that at some length at Question Time today.

We have had the European Union sanctions, and the United Kingdom is very clear in its assessment of the position and the pressure that we exert. It would be helpful if others in the international community, including those in the rest of Africa, were equally straight and honest about the cause of the problems in Zimbabwe. That would bring closer the day when the change that is needed will happen, so that the Zimbabwean people's nightmare can come to an end.

Palestine

7. Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the effect of the Palestinian elections on international aid flows to Palestine. [53964]

The Secretary of State for International Development (Hilary Benn): I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) a moment ago.

Mrs. Humble: Further to my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend, may I ask whether, if he does not receive assurances from Hamas about its involvement in terrorism, he will consider providing that essential aid for the poor people of Palestine through non-governmental organisations that will then be properly monitored?

Hilary Benn: That is one of the things that the international community will need to consider. Ultimately, it is a question of striking the balance between being absolutely clear about the principles that the Quartet has set out and which we expect Hamas to accept, and ensuring that poor Palestinians do not suffer even more. However, it will not be possible to say precisely what the alternative ways of giving support might be until it is clear what a Hamas-led Government will decide to do.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [53973] Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 1 March.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before I list my engagements, let me say that I am sure the whole House will join me in sending our condolences to the families of the two British soldiers who were killed in Iraq yesterday. They were doing a vital and important job, and we owe them a great debt of gratitude.

I am also sure that the House will join me in sending our warm wishes to Mr. Speaker for a speedy recovery.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Andrew Miller: Let me—on behalf of the whole House, I am sure—associate myself with my right hon. Friend's remarks about the soldiers, and, indeed, the absence of Mr. Speaker.

My right hon. Friend will know that in my constituency, local industry has done a tremendous amount in addressing issues of climate change. To remain competitive, however, industries need the strengthening of international agreements. What steps is my right hon. Friend taking to develop such agreements?

The Prime Minister: Along with my right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Secretary of State for International Development, I met representatives of the "Stop Climate Chaos" coalition yesterday. We need to do three major things. First, we need to strengthen the international framework, both through the United Nations process and through the G8-plus 5 dialogue, which has been very useful indeed. Secondly, we need stronger action at European level, especially on the extension of the emissions trading system post-2012. Thirdly, obviously, we need action here. We are giving careful consideration to the idea of a carbon budget, which was advanced by the coalition yesterday. However, I think that this country has led the way over the past few years in respect of the environment and climate change, and we must continue to do so.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): May I join the Prime Minister in expressing our sympathy for the families of the two British soldiers who died in Iraq yesterday? They died serving our country, and we should honour their memory. I also agree with what the Prime Minister said about Mr. Speaker, and wish him a speedy return.

On a happier note, may I thank the Prime Minister for the flowers that he sent to my family? He may not know that I received flowers from both No. 10 and No. 11. I am delighted to be the first man in history to get bunched by both our Prime Ministers.

Yesterday, the Government published their Education and Inspections Bill. The phrase "trust schools", which appeared throughout the White Paper, has now disappeared. Can the Prime Minister confirm that he is renaming those schools "foundation schools," and that they will have all the same freedoms?

The Prime Minister: Let me first congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the birth of his child, wish him and his family well, and say thank you to him for his thanks to me for the flowers? I am glad that the Chancellor was immensely generous in sending him flowers as well. Whether he will be as generous in the Budget I do not know. I certainly hope that that is the limit of his generosity to the right hon. Gentleman. We do not for legal reasons need to mention the words "trust school". It is exactly the same for specialist schools, which are not mentioned in legislation either. However, the trust schools will have exactly the freedoms that we have set out in the legislation and those freedoms will allow schools by a simple vote of their governing body to become self-governing trust schools.

Mr. Cameron: Good, so trust schools remain. That is important. That is clear. Let me try to clarify something else. The Government's White Paper said that local authorities would not be able to provide new schools. The Prime Minister made a concession and said that they could, but that the Secretary of State for Education and Skills would have a veto. Will he confirm that, as the Bill goes through the House, that veto will remain in the Bill?

The Prime Minister: It has to remain for this reason. We have made this clear all the way through. The change was made because we listened to the Local Government Association, which includes Conservative as well as Labour members, which said that, if the driving force behind this is parental choice and parents want a new community school, it seems a bit much to prevent local authorities from being in the competition to provide a new school. However, let me emphasise that, if a local authority proposes a new community school, it is not then the deciding authority. That decision is made by the adjudicator. Of course, the Secretary of State has to have the power to ensure that it is in accordance with parental choice.

Mr. Cameron: Good, so the veto remains in the Bill. Given that the Prime Minister has our support, he does not have to make any further concessions to the rebels, so will he make it clear that the Bill will not be weakened any further?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I do make that clear, but let me say to the right hon. Gentleman that I do not know whether he agrees with what we have done, with local authorities being able to propose community schools. If he does—both Conservative and Labour members of the Local Government Association have said that that should happen—that is a point of agreement between us. Also, as far as I am aware, he now supports us on selection and agrees that we should put in safeguards against selection. So we now have a very happy consensus between us and I look forward to seeing him in the Lobbies.

Mr. Cameron: The right hon. Gentleman will see me in the Lobbies. We back school freedom. That is 200 of us. If he can just find 150 of his own MPs, we can get on and pass the Bill.

Two former Cabinet Ministers, the right hon. Members for North Tyneside (Mr. Byers) and for Darlington (Mr. Milburn), have said that the Prime Minister's position would be untenable if he relied on Conservative support. Does he agree that that is nonsense and that he should just get on and do the right thing for school standards and for our children?

The Prime Minister: We are doing the right thing for our children. What we have done so far as a result of the changes and the investment and reform in our schools is that we have raised standards substantially. We have 100,000 extra staff in our schools—teachers and teaching assistants—the biggest ever building programme for schools is under way, and this country's schools have had the best results they have ever had for children at the ages of 11, 16 and 18. We will continue to do the right thing for children in our country because we want to ensure that every child, no matter what their background, gets the best start in life.

Mr. Piara S. Khabra (Ealing, Southall) (Lab): What information is available about the whereabouts of Osama bin Laden and what intelligence reports are available about his activities?

The Prime Minister: On the whereabouts, for obvious reasons, if I knew, I could not say. In respect of the activities, there is absolutely no doubt that, around the world, al-Qaeda and linked groups are causing, and are engaged in, acts of terrorism that are killing many innocent people. Whatever part of the world it is, whether it is Iraq, Afghanistan, any of the middle eastern countries or indeed Europe, that organisation, with its evil ideology, continues to kill wholly innocent people in an attempt to destroy the values that I believe most people in the world share of democracy, freedom and respect for human rights.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): I associate my right hon. and hon. Friends with the expressions of sympathy that the Prime Minister made at the beginning and extend our good wishes to the Speaker for a speedy return.

The Prime Minister recently described Camp X-Ray in Guantanamo Bay as an anomaly that would have to be dealt with sooner or later. When will it be dealt with—sooner, or later?

The Prime Minister: As I said, I hope that a judicial process can be put in place that means that Guantanamo Bay can close, as I think it should for the reasons that I have given. However, the reason why I always qualify my answer on this issue is as follows. This arose out of the worst terrorist act that the world has ever known, in which 3,000 totally innocent people lost their lives in New York. The people who were picked up in Afghanistan were engaged in helping the reactionary forces there to defeat American and British troops. So I agree that Guantanamo Bay is an anomaly, which is why it has to end, but I am afraid that when I answer questions on it, I will always draw attention to the circumstances in which it was introduced.

Sir Menzies Campbell: Along with the outrage of Guantanamo Bay, there remains the continuing problem of the unequal extradition arrangements between the United Kingdom and the United States. How can the Prime Minister be comfortable with an extradition treaty that results in British citizens having inferior rights to American citizens, and which the US Senate shows no signs of ratifying?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept that the rights of British citizens are subject to unfairness. I am very sorry to have to say this to the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Liberal Democrats, but I sometimes wish that they would spend a little of the effort that they put into attacking the United States on understanding why these international terrorism issues are so important, and why it is important that we stand with our allies in defeating global terrorism. [Interruption.] People can say what they like about it, but I am also entitled to say what I like about it. I find the uneven way that the Liberal Democrats always express themselves on this issue—[Interruption.] I am sorry, but I find it an affront, given what people are facing right round the world: a global terrorism that I would have thought we could unite against and defeat.

Q2. [53974] Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): Is it not the case that the terrorist attacks on Londoners last July murdered people of all faiths and were condemned by people of all faiths? If someone carries a placard announcing, "Europe, you will pay. 7/7—it's on its way", would not most British people agree that that statement glorifies terrorism? So will my right hon. Friend say to the Lords, glorification—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I think that the point has been made.

The Prime Minister: The point has been made, and obviously, I agree with it.

Mr. David Cameron (Witney) (Con): On bird flu, is the Prime Minister personally convinced that all the necessary preparations have been made? In particular, are there sufficient quantities of bird flu vaccines, and when will the Government set out the circumstances in which vaccination will be used? Is it not essential that we avoid repeating the mistakes made during the foot and mouth outbreak, when decisions on such issues were made too late in the day?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman on vaccination. A series of people—our chief scientific adviser, the chief veterinary officer and others—advise us and sensibly we follow their advice. I am not an expert on this issue and nor is the right hon. Gentleman, but these people are. The reason why we have taken the view against vaccination, on their advice, is that they say that although vaccination is effective in stopping birds dying, it is not effective in stopping the virus spreading. Their worry has always been that vaccination masks the disease, rather than stopping it spreading. That is their reason and it is sensible in these circumstances to stick closely with the expert advice that we receive. And yes, I am satisfied that—in so far as it is possible—we have all the necessary precautions in place.

Mr. Cameron: Yesterday, the chief scientific adviser said that he anticipates that bird flu will arrive in Britain.

Why are the Government waiting until April to carry out the full field trial of their contingency plans? Is there not a strong case for bringing forward that trial?

The Prime Minister: The advice that we have is that exercises engaged in during January—and during this month—provide us with a sufficient basis for the precautionary measures that we are going to take. In addition, the so-called Newcastle strain of the disease, which led to an exercise being carried out last December, has given us a fairly strong basis on which to work. But as I said earlier to the right hon. Gentleman, there are people whom we meet regularly—I met them myself just the other day—in order to be satisfied that the necessary precautions are in place. It is important that we maintain the right balance between taking the right precautionary measures and not worrying or concerning people unduly. As the chief scientific adviser said, the fact that the H5N1 virus has been found in Europe enhances the risk of it coming here. Its possible spread into poultry involves one set of considerations, but whether that transmutes into some different, human form of the virus is a completely separate issue. As I said, we get regular updates from those who advise us about the precautions that we should take, and we try to strike the balance that I set out, in the right way. I am very happy to make available to the right hon. Gentleman any of the information that we have so that he can satisfy himself on that point too.

Mark Durkan (Foyle) (SDLP): Today is Ash Wednesday. Will the Prime Minister say that he and his Government are definitely giving up side deals in Northern Ireland for Lent—and, hopefully, for good? Will he set a date for the restoration of the institutions that are currently suspended, and call an end to the malingering and posturing of the parties involved?

The Prime Minister: We will do our best to try to get an agreement, as we have over the years. However, the hon. Gentleman has long experience of dealing with these matters and will know that, in the end, the Government can facilitate but that it is for the parties involved to agree. If he can give me a little bit of help and reach agreement with the other political parties, I am very willing to come in behind him.

Q3. [53975] Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): In the south-east, reservoirs and rivers are at their lowest levels for three decades, and hosepipe bans have been in force for seven months. Since the Government are insisting on proposals to build more than 500,000 new homes in the area, does the Prime Minister accept that they have a responsibility to deal with that deficit in local infrastructure first?

The Prime Minister: It is important that we combine any development with the local infrastructure, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that no responsible Government could not plan to build more homes. The country needs them, and they are a necessary consequence of any sensible housing policy for the future, but he is right: of course it is important to put in infrastructure planning at the same time, and that is what we are doing. That requires substantial extra investment, and fortunately my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made the money available. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not trying to suggest that it would somehow be wrong to plan ahead for the increase in housing, because it is necessary.

Q4. [53977] Mrs. Joan Humble (Blackpool, North and Fleetwood) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the work of the Commission for Social Care Inspection, and of the "Stand Up for Social Care" campaign run by Community Care magazine? The aim is to raise the profile of the 1.5 million people who work in social care. Will he ensure that adequate resources are made available, so that social care workers can be equal partners in delivering on the health and social care agenda?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right, and the Government have provided some £11.5 billion for local councils for adult personal services this year, an increase of £850 million on the previous year. She is also right to draw attention to the need to continue to develop the adult social care service, and the Green Paper entitled "Independence, Well-Being and Choice" is a very important part of that. Incidentally, I also pay great tribute to the work done in this area by the voluntary sector.

Q5. [53978] Mr. Richard Bacon (South Norfolk) (Con): Will the present inquiry by the Cabinet Secretary examine whether the Home Office acted improperly in relation to an extradition request involving Mr. Mills?

The Prime Minister: We will, of course, examine any allegations that are made, and reply to them fully.

Q6. [53979] Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, East) (Lab): I trust that my right hon. Friend enjoyed the very warm welcome that he received in Aviemore last Friday, when he addressed the Scottish Labour conference and went on to break the ground for the Glendoe hydroelectric scheme. Did he notice that, after he left, the conference passed an excellent resolution on energy that urged that consideration be given to clean coal and new-generation nuclear plants, alongside the use of renewables? Does he consider that to be the sensible approach? The Tories and the Scottish National party reject onshore wind and nuclear generation, respectively. Does he agree that they are playing fast and loose with our energy future?

The Prime Minister: I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend says and I think that the position adopted by the Scottish Labour party was extremely sensible. We need all of those things together, including the renewables. We obviously need to consider the issue of nuclear power for the future and clean coal technology is also dramatically important. I hope that when we publish the results of the energy review, my hon. Friend will see reflected some of the sensible concerns that were expressed in Aviemore last week.

Mr. Rob Wilson (Reading, East) (Con): Does the Prime Minister agree that his Education and Inspections Bill is more radical than it first appears? Does he agree that it will deliver a final blow to the failed comprehensive education system and the overweening powers of local education authorities?

The Prime Minister: Well, it is interesting that the Conservatives indicate that they are against the principle of all-ability teaching. The hon. Gentleman is a bit behind his leadership, which has switched positions on that subject over the past few months. I believe absolutely in all-ability teaching and I think that it is important. But I also think that schools should have the freedom to develop in the way that they want, within the process of all-ability teaching, and the freedom to manage their assets and staff in the way that they want. Under this Government, we have seen dramatic improvements in the number of children getting the right results, as a result of investment that the Conservative party opposed each and every point of the way.

Q7. [53980] Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is totally unacceptable to have 22 per cent. price increases in gas at the same time as profits of £1.5 billion for British Gas? Has not the time come for a windfall tax to ensure investment in new gas streams in the UK and the further introduction of storage facilities in order to bring the price down to help the poor consumer?

The Prime Minister: Well, I agree with my hon. Friend that there has been much concern about the recent rises. It is true that even with those increases we are still well below the EU median level and other countries have also seen significant price increases, but he is right to draw attention to the steepness of the price rises. One answer is to liberalise energy markets in Europe still further, and that is an important part of the answer. But I entirely understand the concern that he raises.

Q8. [53981] Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): Some 11,000 fewer people in Altrincham and Sale have an NHS dentist than when the Prime Minister came to power. Why does he think that is?

The Prime Minister: Back in the 1990s—[Interruption.] I am sorry, but a contract was introduced by the previous Government in the early 1990s that allowed dentists to leave the NHS if they wanted to. It is the Labour party that has put more money into dentists and is hiring more dentists from overseas, but we cannot force dentists to come back into the NHS. That is why there are not more NHS dentists in the hon. Gentleman's area.

Rosie Cooper (West Lancashire) (Lab): Major cities appear to be prioritised by regional bodies in north-west transport projects. Does my right hon. Friend agree that long-standing local priorities, such as the Ormskirk bypass in my constituency, which has been second in the Lancashire priorities for the past 10 years, cannot be dismissed and demoted at a stroke?

The Prime Minister: I understand entirely the concern that my hon. Friend raises and the investment in that has significantly increased. I am of course happy to look into the point that she raises and to write to her.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): The Prime Minister will be aware that the family of Emily Jenkins, who was tragically killed in the 7/7 bombings, has set up a charity to post on the internet basic, non-confidential information about the victims, in a timely manner, to reunite victims and relatives. Why will his Government not give the necessary permissions for the scheme to go ahead, especially in the light of the failure of existing systems to give any timely guidance to relatives on 7/7?

The Prime Minister: I thought that we had a very great deal of provision available for those families who tragically lost people in the 7/7 bombings. I am happy to look at the initiative that Beverley Chambers has put forward, and I will reflect on that and get back to the hon. Lady as soon as possible.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister rightly congratulated the Leader of the Opposition on the birth of his son. I, too, wish him, his wife and his baby well, but I feel a little embarrassed because I have not sent him any flowers. However, should we remind the Leader of the Opposition about the Labour party's child trust fund—the so-called baby bond—which has been advantageous for many of my constituents?

The Prime Minister: An immense amount has been done for children in this country, not just through tax credits but, as my hon. Friend rightly says, through the trust fund; and of course, for some of the poorest families in the country, as a result of the rises in child benefit, the minimum wage, the child care tax credit and the children's credit—all of which the Conservatives opposed—we have done an immense amount to lift children out of poverty. Indeed, about 700,000 children have been lifted out of poverty since we came to office.

Q10. [53983] Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Returning to extradition, surely the Prime Minister cannot be comfortable that, as a result of his recent legislation, British citizens accused of non-terrorist offences can be extradited to the United States of America, yet the promised reciprocal legislation in America is not in place. What will he do to put pressure on the President to introduce that legislation quickly and when will it come into effect?

The Prime Minister: The issue, as I understand it, is actually within Congress itself. However, it is important that we make sure that we get the reciprocal provisions in place and we will continue to do all that we can. We still believe, however, that it is right to have those extradition proceedings in place in respect of America.

Q11. [53984] Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): The Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Act 2005, which we pushed through the House despite opposition, gives local authorities tough powers to deal with environmental issues such as litter, fly-posting and graffiti. Is the Prime Minister convinced that local authorities will use those powers?

The Prime Minister: Around 20,000 fixed-penalty notices have been issued by local authorities, but my hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the fact that not enough local authorities are using them. As I constantly say about this issue—which is linked to antisocial behaviour—we have given local communities the powers and resources but it is up to communities themselves to use them. He is right to say that local authorities now have a great deal more power than before, and fixed-penalty notices are a simple way to make sure that things such as dog fouling and littering can be easily dealt with by local authorities, but they need to use the powers they have been given.

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): Given that more than 1 million hard-of-hearing people say that they use subtitles whenever they can, does not the Prime Minister think that it sets an extremely bad example that there is no such facility on our own Parliament channel and will he take urgent action to make sure that deaf people have the same access to democracy as everyone else?

The Prime Minister: For once, I am in the happy position of saying that it is not up to me to decide how Parliament arranges its affairs, but I am sure that those who are looking at these things will—[Laughter.] I do not know that an outbreak of laughter is the right response from my right hon. Friend—[Interruption.] I am sure he will. No doubt discussions in the usual channels can take place; but it is a matter not for me but for Parliament.

Q12. [53987] Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East) (Lab): My right hon. Friend has done a fantastic job delivering lots of things—in particular, off-peak local travel for pensioners—so will he put the icing on the cake by reducing the qualifying age for a free TV licence to 65 so that our pensioners can travel, keep warm and watch the telly in peace?

The Prime Minister: Well, I am not sure that I can promise to do that, but my hon. Friend is absolutely right in drawing attention to the fact that something like 3.5 million households have benefited from free TV licences. There is also the winter fuel allowance and, as he says, free travel for OAPs at off-peak times. Taken together with the money spent on pension credit, there has been a massive increase in the support that the Government have given to pensioners. In addition, incidentally, 4 million pensioner households have been lifted out of fuel poverty, so I cannot promise to do more, but my hon. Friend is entirely right to draw attention to what we have done already.

Mr. Mark Harper (Forest of Dean) (Con): In a written answer to me this week, the Secretary of State for International Development confirmed that the Government's success criterion for the alternative livelihoods programme in Afghanistan is only a 10 per cent. year-on-year increase in the uptake of legal livelihood opportunities. Is that really adequate to the challenge we face in Afghanistan, especially with the forthcoming deployment of British forces? If we fail, we shall create not stability but further insurgency, and put our troops at great risk.

The Prime Minister: Of course, the hon. Gentleman is right to draw attention to the issue and the problem, but we have to make progress as we can and a lot depends on the security situation. If we can go faster, we will, but we have set a target that we believe is reasonable at the moment. What is happening in the south of Afghanistan is an attempt by al-Qaeda and the Taliban to regain control of a country that wants a democracy; millions of its people voted in democratic elections for the President and Parliament. Of course, it is important that our troops do all that they can to secure the situation so that the country can move forward in peace, but we have set targets on the change of livelihoods on the basis of advice given to us as to the realistic prospect of what we can achieve on a year-by-year basis.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): This could be the last question in the session today. Could the Prime Minister take the opportunity to explain to the wider world why there is such wide and deep unease about the trust schools proposal among Labour Members, yet such unfettered enthusiasm among Opposition Members? Is not this politics scripted by Lewis Carroll?

The Prime Minister: I will take a bet with my hon. Friend that there will be more Labour MPs than Conservative MPs in the yes Lobby for the Education and Inspections Bill. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh?"] Well, we will wait and see. He is entirely entitled to take the view that he does, but the reason why I believe in these reforms so passionately is that, over the past few years, we have made big improvements in our education system; but it is not good enough when, even for all the progress and improvement—far more kids are getting the GCSEs that they need at 16 than 10 years ago—40 per cent. still do not get five good GCSEs. Now in some of the poorest areas, for the schools that have been worst performing, it is necessary in my view to take radical action. We want to do that with local authorities. We want to make sure that we do it in a way that encourages schools to develop, so that every child, no matter what their background or what their class, gets the best start in life, and I think that those are good Labour principles.

Video Games

12.32 pm

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Video Recordings Act 1984 to extend certain provisions of that Act to video games and to make provision about the labelling of video games.

Video games have increasingly life-like graphics and antisocial themes. Their regulation has improved, but it has not gone far enough. The voluntary code must be made statutory and further safeguards put in place to protect our children.

Over the past two years, other hon. Members and I have campaigned to control the sale of video games to young people, following the tragic death of Stefan Pakeerah—a 14-year-old Leicester schoolboy who was brutally murdered. Stefan's parents believe that the perpetrator of that savage attack was influenced by the video game "Manhunt". Stefan's mother, Giselle Pakeerah, has been campaigning to ban the sale of the game. I pay tribute to Mrs. Pakeerah—a brave and courageous mother who, in her grief, could easily have let matters pass by doing nothing, but who started an impressive campaign on this issue.

Towards the end of 2004, Mrs. Pakeerah and I met the Prime Minister and urged him to tackle the menace of violent video games by examining the existing law governing the classification of such games and, in particular, labelling, and by requesting the British Board of Film Classification to take a more cautious approach. I am most grateful to the Prime Minister for his concern on this issue. Following the meeting, in December 2004, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department of Trade and Industry met representatives from the video games industry to consider the adequacy of existing provisions. Some new voluntary measures were introduced. New labelling for age restrictions is now twice the size it was a year ago. I welcome the industry's efforts in beginning to take action.

I am also grateful to the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport and the Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (James Purnell), who has responsibility for the creative industries, for meeting me to discuss their Department's continuing willingness to explore ways to strengthen such protection.

The concern about video and computer games is based on the belief that violent games are totally inappropriate for young children. Between the ages of seven and 17, children will play an average of eight hours of video games a week. However, despite recent voluntary steps, this aspect of children's entertainment is highly under-regulated. Moreover, the regulation that does exist is barely enforced.

The video games industry in the United Kingdom is widely and rightly seen as one of our many economic success stories. The latest figures show that the software development and publishing industry in the UK is worth £711 million. Most games on the market are appropriate for young players, but the few games that feature violence, crime and antisocial behaviour have led to concerns being raised. The Bill is not intended to censor the industry. However, we must recognise that it is our duty to protect our children from inappropriate influences such as violent video games.

The current trend in video games is for players to be the bad guys and act out criminal fantasies, earning points for attacking and killing innocent bystanders. In the forthcoming Rockstar video game "Bully", players take on the role of Jimmy Hopkins, a school boy at a boarding school. They get points for physically and psychologically tormenting other children. More than 50 Members have signed early-day motion 1172, which calls for the game to be banned.

The 2004 game "Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas" has been among the top 10 best-selling games for the past two years and has sold a total of 12 million copies worldwide, including 1 million copies in the United Kingdom in the first nine days after its release. The game contained a hidden code that could be unlocked by players and which introduced to the game scenes in which characters performed sexually explicit acts. Following campaigns in the United States, the publishers were forced to recall and rewrite the game to remove the hidden code.

Although those games are rated 18 for adult audiences, they are extremely popular among young people. This type of content is wholly inappropriate and unacceptable, but, regrettably, that is the path down which the games are heading. British research into the effects of video games has been inconclusive so far. A number of studies, including research published by DCMS today, have found no conclusive evidence that video games can influence children's behaviour. However, studies into the long-term effects of video games are in their infancy and are at best speculative. Due to ethical difficulties associated with exposing children to adult material, it is difficult to secure conclusive evidence either way—difficult, but not impossible.

On 25 January 2006, during Prime Minister's questions, I raised the findings of new research published by Professor Bruce Bartholow of the university of Missouri-Columbia last year, which shows that people who play violent video games become desensitised to violence and are more likely to commit aggressive acts. It is the first research to show that playing violent video games diminishes brain reactions to violent images. It shows a link between the playing of violent video games and a propensity to commit aggressive acts. Those who believe that violent video games have no effect on the person playing them are ignoring the facts. The link exists and should give us great cause for concern.

The implications of the research, which was published in the Journal of Experimental Social Psychology, are far-reaching. Every precaution should be taken to ensure that children are not exposed to games that will diminish their sensitivity to violence. Children need to be protected from violent games for this reason: although a child's morality continues to grow and mature as they grow older, they are still immature and lack the necessary capabilities to deal with the exposure to violence that these games give them. The warnings offered by the research need to be taken seriously and should urge us all towards cautionary, preventive regulations to protect our children.

[Keith Vaz]

At the moment, regulation is very confusing, as two rating systems are in use: the British Board of Film Classification, which rates about 2 per cent. of games, and the voluntary PEGI, or pan-European game information, system. The director of the Entertainment and Leisure Software Publishers Association, Roger Bennett, concedes that the ratings are not always clear. He states:

"BBFC ratings are on the front of games boxes, while ELSPA's are on the back. If a game does not have a BBFC rating, people sometimes assume it is suitable for children, forgetting to check the back."

Furthermore, a study by the Swiss firm Modulum showed that "parents perceive age ratings as a guide but not as a definitive prohibition".

Current regulations are often ignored by retailers. An investigation for "Tonight with Trevor McDonald" in November 2004 uncovered the fact that children as young as 12 had managed to buy adult video games. Over two thirds of 11 to 14-year-old boys questioned admitted to playing video games with an 18 certificate. On camera, children between the ages of 12 and 14 were shown buying adult video games from Tesco, Virgin, Dixons, John Lewis, Sainsbury's and Asda.

Other countries have adopted a different approach. In Canada, in the European Union and even in the United States, action has been taken. This Bill will make it a requirement not only to have a larger sign indicating the certificate but to have an accompanying description of the content that led to the game being given that rating.

This is not about adult censorship; it is about protecting our children. We need to act now before it is too late.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Keith Vaz, Annette Brooke, Mrs. Betty Williams, Mr. Edward O'Hara, Mr. Elfyn Llwyd, Mrs. Iris Robinson, Jessica Morden, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mr. Mike Hancock, Sir Nicholas Winterton, Mr. Stephen Crabb and Derek Wyatt.

VIDEO GAMES

Keith Vaz accordingly presented a Bill to amend the Video Recordings Act 1984 to extend certain provisions of that Act to video games and to make provision about the labelling of video games: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 12 May, and to be printed [Bill 136].

Opposition Day

[14TH ALLOTTED DAY]

Dentistry

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister and placed a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches. May I also add that the amount of time available to Back Benchers will depend to a great extent on the restraint shown by the three Front-Bench spokesmen?

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House supports the achievement of good oral health through the provision of NHS dentistry; calls, therefore, on the Government to fulfil its commitment that everyone should have access to NHS dentistry; is alarmed that the British Dental Association regards the new dental contract as 'a shambles' and is concerned that many dentists will reduce their commitment to NHS dentistry; and further calls on the Government to withdraw the National Health Service (General Dental Services Contracts) Regulations 2005 and the National Health Service (Personal Dental Service Agreements) Regulations 2005 and immediately to re-open negotiations with the dental profession on dental services contracts which are piloted and linked to patient registration and capitation payments, support for preventative work and the achievement of good oral health.

In September 1999, the Prime Minister said that by 2001 everyone would have access to NHS dentistry just by calling NHS Direct. Six years after he made that pledge fewer people than ever are registered for NHS dentistry. In those six years we have seen queues forming outside the premises of NHS dentists who are opening up their registrations. We may not see that in future because the Government propose that people will not be able to queue outside NHS premises to be registered; they will have to register by letter or by telephone—queuing is too embarrassing. Indeed, the situation has now become so bad that the public are queuing outside private dentists.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): Patients in Torbay are being told that they must not queue outside any new NHS dentist. I am advised that they have received letters informing them that it would be embarrassing for the primary care trust to have people queuing because it knows that so many people want dental treatment and that there are so few NHS dentists. Is that not outrageous?

Mr. Lansley: It is outrageous.

I visited Torbay before the last general election and talked to the secretary of the local dental committee. If I recall correctly, the number of patients registered in south Devon was under 30 per cent.—among the lowest in the country. Indeed, the number in my constituency was also among the lowest in the country.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): A Castle Point dentist and a local dental committee secretary, Mr. Foreman, states in a letter dated 21 January:

"Under the terms of the new contract our CACV has been reduced by some 80 per cent. from our historic NHS gross average."

Dentists in Castle Point do a great job and we must fund them properly. We must stop ill-thought-out cuts. Does my hon. Friend agree that the Government's policy is a shambles and will reduce the number of NHS patients?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is not only me who thinks that the policy is a shambles. The British Dental Association also thinks that it is a shambles. The association said that Ministers conducted the contract negotiations leading to a new dental contract with "extraordinary ineptitude". It described it as a "shambolic process". It has been a shambles. Over recent years, dentists have reduced their commitment to the NHS because they have been on a treadmill of drill and fill. We have known for years that change is necessary. That was why the Conservative Government, before the 1997 general election, introduced legislation that established primary care trusts and personal dental services contracts.

The Government have pursued a new dental contract based not on new ways of working but on targets. They propose a target-driven process that does not recognise the needs of the profession or of patients.

Damian Green (Ashford) (Con): My hon. Friend and the Minister might be interested in an e-mail that I received a few days ago from a constituent. It reads:

"Since I moved to Ashford some 40 years ago I have attended the same dental practice. Last Tuesday, after my six-months check-up, I was advised that due to Government contract changes I would not be able to make a new appointment."

That is what dentists believe and that is what their patients believe. Contract changes are driving people away from the NHS.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention. His experience is the same as mine in Bar Hill in my constituency, where a dental practice has walked away from a new dental contract. That experience is mirrored throughout the country.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): I thank my hon. Friend for visiting the town of Hornsea in my constituency. As he knows, it is an isolated rural town. It is the largest town in the country without an A-road into it. The threat, when he visited the town, concerned community hospitals. That threat still remains. However, there are three dental practices in the town, two of which have announced in the past week that, thanks to the Government's shambolic handling of dental contracts, they are leaving the NHS. Seven thousand fewer of my constituents are now registered with NHS dentists than before the Prime Minister's promise was made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I should have added that the length of interventions will have some impact on opportunities to participate later in the debate.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I am grateful, too, to my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley and Holderness (Mr. Stuart) for making that important point. Apart from persistent inequalities in terms of dental outcomes and dental health, inequality is increasingly apparent in terms of access to NHS dentistry, all of which is a condemnation of the Government.

Ed Balls (Normanton) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Lansley: How can I resist the hon. Member?

Ed Balls: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reminding us of a previous Conservative Government with his reference to funding issues. On the "Today" programme this morning, the Leader of the Opposition confirmed that it was his party's policy to introduce a third fiscal rule—the proceeds of growth rule—which would mean that spending would fall as a percentage of gross domestic product under a Conservative Government. Does the hon. Gentleman expect the NHS and dentistry to be carved out of that rule, or does he expect it to apply to them too? If so, public spending would fall as a percentage of GDP on dentistry services.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, whose point comes from the bottom of page 2 of the Labour party briefing—we will see if we reach the rest of those listed. One would have thought that the hon. Gentleman could at least write his own interventions. We made clear before the election what we intended to do about dentistry, and our proposals would have made an enormous difference. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman in his previous occupations had occasion to read "Proposals for modern oral health", which was published in October 2004 by the Conservative party, but before the election we set out proposals based on registration

"to encourage an ongoing relationship for patients with a general dental practice."

The Government, however, propose to abolish registration. We proposed, too, a shift from fee-based remuneration to capitation. The Government propose to retain an activity-driven system, instead of introducing a system in which finances are driven by the number of patients on a practice list. We proposed a low-cost monthly payment scheme for non-exempt adults—the Government propose to increase the charges for patients—and oral health promotion focused on children. The Government, however have enabled primary care trusts—and, in some respects, they have encouraged them—to refuse children for treatment and exempt adult contracts for dentists. Finally, we proposed an "evidence-based schedule for NHS dentistry designed by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence".

At least the Government have begun to introduce that proposal.

Ed Balls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No, of course not. If the hon. Gentleman does not have anything original to say, I am not going to help him.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): Will my hon. Friend include in his policies a commitment that the Government of the day should fund private dental care if someone is wholly unable to obtain NHS dentistry because none is available?

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend, but I am not going to make that pledge. My objective, and the objective of the Conservative party, is to secure access to NHS dentistry for people in this country on an equitable basis. Inequalities of access have given rise to the need for a new contract. The purpose of the motion is to make the Government realise that it is the eleventh hour—it is one month to the day before the new dental contract comes into force. The profession are against the contract, and it profoundly disagreed with it in earlier discussions. The Government, however, refused to listen. In December last year, the British Dental Association literally walked away from the negotiations, and said that talking to the Government was akin to a one-way street. It talked to the Government, but the Government did not respond.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con) rose—

Mr. Lansley: I shall give way to my hon. Friend, as I know that he is anxious to contribute.

Mark Pritchard: I am always anxious to contribute to debates secured by my hon. Friend. Does he agree that there is concern about oral health because of the lack of access to dentists, and that cancers of the mouth may increase and orthodontic provisions could be affected?

Mr. Lansley: That is absolutely right. A central reason why dentists as a profession want to spend more time with patients is that they want to undertake proper preventive work and good oral health work. In the mechanics of the contracts, the Government have not taken proper account of the time that it takes for new orthodontic practices to establish their work. Practices across the country, including one in my own constituency, have written to me, because they have been offered a contract that dramatically underestimates the amount of work that they need to do. The base year or target year did not include their work because they had established themselves more recently.

The dentists walked away from negotiations with the Government, so the Government proceeded on the wrong basis. They did not introduce proposals based on registration or a capitation system. Their proposals did not encourage preventive work or promote good oral health. They should work with the profession, rather than against it. Not only is the profession against the Government, but this morning, Which? published a survey in which 79 per cent. of the public said that they do not trust the Government to improve dentistry in the next year. The profession and the public are saying the same thing, so the Government must think again. The motion is designed to make sure that they do so. The contract is a shambles, and it is not based on the primary dental services pilots. It does not include a UDA system. I apologise to the House. There are no Northern Ireland Members in the Chamber, but by "UDA" I mean "units of dental activity". The personal dental services contracts were not established on that basis, although the UDA system allows dentists to spend more time with patients and takes account of the size of patient lists. The Government would not proceed with such proposals, which is tragic.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): Is it not irresponsible of the Government to introduce an untried and untested system, which is causing chaos throughout the United Kingdom, and will not achieve their aim of improving the quality of care for patients, securing access to dentistry and improving the nation's oral health?

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is right, and has captured the profession's view. I have already cited the British Dental Association, which has said:

> "The new contract will not secure patient access, improve oral health or raise the quality of care."

Those are the things that we are supposed to target, but the Government are not setting out to achieve them. The contract is seriously flawed.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): Leicestershire primary care trusts have a £6 million shortfall, so it will be impossible to deliver even the care that is available this year. That is on top of the complaints by the Leicestershire local dental committee, which is almost unanimously against the proposals, particularly the decision to charge on a treatment basis rather than per visit.

Mr. Lansley: My hon. Friend is quite right. The pictures of people queuing for a dentist in the Leicester Mercury are testament to the difficulties that they are facing in the light of the withdrawal of services. The Secretary of State has not bothered to stay in the Chamber to discuss dentistry, but there are dental practices in her own constituency that have written to my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Dr. Murrison) to say that they have ceased to provide NHS dentistry. We need a new contract. Not only do practices find it impossible to secure contracts that will enable them to continue to look after their patients—90 per cent. have experienced difficulties with contract values—but, as I have said, they have lost the ability to charge for missed appointments. They can no longer offer services to exempt adults and children.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): Absolutely.

Mr. Lansley: Well, there is a problem with which we must deal, as some dental practices say that adults can only register their children for NHS work if they enter into a private contract themselves. PCTs, however, have told practices that they cannot offer a contract to treat children and exempt adults on the NHS, whether or not the practice has made that condition. Children have therefore been thrown off NHS lists, even though their dentist is willing to offer NHS dentistry.

Ms Winterton: As the hon. Gentleman knows, because of demands in this House dentists were following exactly the practice that he outlined by saying, "We'll take your children on the NHS if you as parents go privately." There can still be children-only lists under the new system. I am sure that he agrees that if primary care trusts believe that it is better for dentists to offer services to children and parents at the same time, it is absolutely right that they have the discretion to do that.

Mr. Lansley: As the BBC survey said this morning, 5 per cent. of primary care trusts are saying that one cannot have exempt adult and children-only lists. I know why they are resisting it—because then there is no patient income.

That brings me on to another essential point—charges. The British Dental Association has accused the Government of using the new contract as a revenue-raising measure contrary to the principles of the national health service, yet this is a Government who talk about a free NHS. In 2004–05, dental charge income was £465 million; in 2006–07, it will be £623 million. Those are the Government's own figures. I only received the latest figures this morning, having asked the question in November—we can only get information out of the Government by bringing this debate to the Floor of the House. That is a 28 per cent. real-terms increase in dental charge income. The Government's contribution to dentistry over those same two years is rising by just 9 per cent.

That is completely contrary to the Government's previous claim that the contribution made by patients towards the cost of dentistry would remain the same. In fact, it is rising—I have just stated the figures. There are three bands of charges. That is simpler, but not necessarily fairer. For example, a check-up will cost £15.50 instead of £5. Lord Warner, the Minister in the other place, said that 42 per cent. of patients get their treatment in band 2 and, of those, three quarters will pay more under the new system. That is what is going on—more charging and more costs for patients. Of course, the Government will parade the fact that £2.7 billion is being spent on dentistry, neglecting to say that the cost of dentistry to patients has increased by one third, on the Government's figures, in the space of two years.

Steve McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Lansley: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would like to explain that.

Steve McCabe: Given the hon. Gentleman's concern about charges, does he agree that there is something unethical—indeed, perhaps involving a breach of data protection legislation—in dentists who are voluntarily opting out of the NHS writing to patients to advise them of private insurance arrangements without disclosing the benefits that they themselves stand to make? Is that appropriate?

Mr. Lansley: I can understand that the hon. Gentleman is embarrassed that dentists are leaving the NHS and writing to their patients, but that is, regrettably, what is happening. They have a relationship with patients and are contacting them to give them details of what they are proposing to do. Instead of the hon. Gentleman criticising dentists, it would be better if he and his hon. Friends tried to work with them. The dentists we have talked to who are leaving NHS dentistry or reducing their commitment to it deeply regret having to do so.

The way forward is clear. Many dentists who sign up to the contract will do so reluctantly. They will be very unhappy with the straitjacket of activity targets that they are being put into. If they start to move beyond the 4 per cent. tolerances, they will find that they have no confidence that contract values will be honoured in future. They may well find that penalties are imposed on them. As time goes on, particularly as the income protection period expires, many will say that they are going to give up and go outside the NHS. A third of the dentists who got together in Birmingham at the local dental committee said that they would not sign the contract, and dentists in many other parts of the country are saying the same.

Instead of dentists reducing their commitment, we must go in the opposite direction. Their commitment to the NHS must be increased if we are to avoid recurring inequalities in access to dental care.

Helen Goodman (Bishop Auckland) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman has repeatedly mentioned inequalities. He is probably not aware that last week, in my constituency's most deprived ward of Coundon, a new health centre was opened with provision for two dental chairs, where there has never been a dentist before. His point is not borne out across the country as a whole.

Mr. Lansley: I received an e-mail from a dentist in north-west London—I think that he was in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Frank Dobson)—who was abandoning NHS dentistry and was deeply depressed about the Government's implementing of the new contracts. I am afraid that wherever one goes, including in north London, there are dentists who are going to do that. This morning the Minister and I discussed on the radio what is happening in Barnsley. I do not know whether any Members from Barnsley are here. That is not a wealthy area, but patients there have been queuing for private dentistry because their dentist has abandoned the NHS.

It is time for a new system. We know where the Government are heading because the Minister has made it perfectly clear in previous discussions. She is threatening dentists by saying that if they do not choose to do NHS work, she will find other dentists who will. There will be dentists coming in from Poland.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): Perhaps, like me, my hon. Friend would like to disabuse the hon. Member for Bishop Auckland (Helen Goodman) of the notion that everything is rosy in NHS dentistry. In my constituency, 34,000 patients have been deregistered, with a huge impact on lower income groups, older people and young families. What is worse is that the primary care trust has been forced into political posturing by operating a hotline that patients have to phone secretly to be told where the new NHS registrations are. That is spin under the NHS.

Mr. Lansley: As my constituency is nearby, I have seen that that is indeed what is happening in my hon. Friend's constituency, where the enormous loss of NHS dentistry is affecting a large proportion of his constituents. I sympathise with him and agree with the support that he is giving to NHS dentistry in his constituency.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): It is not only certain constituencies that are in crisis, but the whole country. When the Select Committee on Health looked into this, the Minister eventually admitted that 30 million people in this country do not have an NHS dentist.

Mr. Lansley: That is right. Only about 40 per cent. of non-exempt adults have access to NHS dentistry. Of course, the Government are going to abolish registration and manipulate the figures. They will say that increased numbers of people see an NHS dentist, but that does not mean that they are necessarily registered with them or have access as they did in the past on the basis of a long-term relationship.

It is deeply worrying that fewer children are getting access to NHS dentistry. This morning's Which? report said that 82 per cent. of the public think it extremely important that children get free dental treatment, but that too is being lost. The inequalities are dramatic. In some places, a quarter of adults have access to NHS dentistry, while in other places it is 60 per cent. That is deeply unacceptable in a national health service.

The Minister always used to say that we need a new way of working; well, we do. We need a new way of working that is not about dentists on a treadmill, particularly a new treadmill that is governed by primary care trusts, which, as the National Audit Office made clear, have none of the expertise necessary to put this new system in place. We cannot move towards the system that the Government seem to be proposing whereby patients have perverse incentives to delay treatment or present as urgent cases with pain because it will be cheaper than if they have the work done while not being in pain. We must have a system whereby the patient's relationship with their dentist is geared around preventive work and good oral health, patients know that they have security of access to NHS dentistry, and dentists are incentivised to offer NHS dentistry and to increase their commitment to NHS dentistry instead of reducing it.

John Hemming (Birmingham, Yardley) (LD): The hon. Gentleman almost certainly knows that the deadline for the first return of contracts was yesterday. If people have not returned their contracts by yesterday, payments will be delayed by a month. The secretary of the Birmingham dental committee told me that 75 per cent. of NHS dentists had not returned their contracts by the deadline. Some may be returned this month but the figures show a massive reduction in the number of NHS dentists in Birmingham.

Mr. Lansley: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. We held discussions with the Birmingham dental committee, as he doubtless has. Dentists in Birmingham are rightly anxious and angry.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Lansley: No.

As I explained, we need a new way of working. However, we have made it clear that it is most important not only to commit ourselves to improving the NHS overall but to trusting NHS professionals. Happily, in this instance, the desires of the patients and the profession are exactly the same. Patients want a relationship with a dentist in which they have security of access and certainty that what is in their interests—good oral health—is being pursued, with their making a reasonable rather than an excessive contribution through charges. That is what we need. The motion calls for that, even at the last minute.

Two weeks ago, the Minister met representatives of the British Dental Association, who left the meeting deeply disappointed with its results. It is not too late for the Government to withdraw the contract, suspend the use of units of dental activity and work through a piloted system that is based on capitation. That is the way forward. I urge the Government to do that even now, and I urge the House to support the motion.

1.11 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Ms Rosie Winterton): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the Government's Oral Health Plan for England, which builds on major oral health improvements in the last 30 years, and the additional £368 million for improving dental services in England announced in July 2004; recognises the Government's substantial achievements in improving the short and longer term supply of dentists for the NHS including recruiting the equivalent of an extra 1,459 whole-time dentists between April 2004 and October 2005, compared to the 1,000 extra dentists promised, and funding an additional 170 training places; further recognises that the Government is investing £80 million in improving dental school facilities, and has approved the establishment of a new dental school in the South West Peninsula; notes that the total number of primary care dentists in the NHS had increased to more than 21,000 by the end of October 2005, compared with 16,700 in 1997; further welcomes the reduction in the maximum patient charge from £384 to £189 from 1st April; further welcomes the new ways of working tested through Personal Dental Services pilots; supports the framework for new dental contracts which will free up significantly more time to provide preventative care, remove the requirement for NHS dentists to treat patients on a fee for service basis and ensure that a committed NHS dentist can expect to earn on average around £80,000 a year; and further welcomes the fact that, where dentists do not take up new contracts, primary care trusts will commission replacement services from other dentists."

Although the motion is flawed, it gives us the opportunity to debate NHS dentistry as we approach the implementation of the most significant reforms to dental services in the history of the NHS. It is worth reminding the House why we are making those changes to NHS dentistry. The current system provides no real stability for patients or the NHS. Under the traditional general dental services system, dentists can set up in practice where and when they wish and decide how much or how little NHS dentistry they wish to undertake. There have traditionally been no local budgets for dentistry. When dentists decide to reduce or abandon their NHS work, the NHS locally has no power to commission replacement services. I know that that has affected hon. Members of all parties and caused immense problems. That volatile system has not served patients well.

On top of that, the contract under which dentists have worked has been extremely unpopular with them, especially following changes that were introduced in the 1990s and the subsequent fee cuts. Let me remind hon. Members that the traditional way of paying dentists is based on payments for 400 individual items of service, for example, a filling, a crown or having a tooth out. That put the emphasis on invasive work rather than preventive treatment. As hon. Members have said in the House previously, it has been confusing for patients, who often did not understand what they were paying for on the NHS and what they were paying for privately. I am sure that many hon. Members have experienced constituents saying, "I've just paid £1,000 for treatment on the NHS." When they have come to me, I have told them that they could not have paid that amount because the maximum that they can currently pay on the NHS is £384. However, confusion between NHS and private treatment has occurred.

The dental profession, especially the British Dental Association, complained for many years about the treadmill effect of how dentists were paid. As I said, that put the emphasis on invasive rather than preventive treatment and was an incredibly bureaucratic system for dentists. Two dental schools were closed under the previous Administration. Again, that significantly reduced the numbers of dentists in training.

To tackle the genuine shortages in access to NHS dentistry, we have taken some immediate action.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I want to speak about clinical dental technicians, who specialise in making dentures, especially for senior citizens. The Minister knows that they are subject to a regulatory review by the General Dental Council and that they want to be brought within a new regulatory framework to remove the anomalous situation under which they have operated for many years. They have two key requests. First, they want a reasonable transition period. Secondly, if retraining must occur, they ask whether it can take place on a part-time basis in the United Kingdom to allow them to retrain in a way that does not destroy their livelihood. Does the Minister agree that that is reasonable and will she make that point to the GDC?

Ms Winterton: I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that the GDC makes its own rules about what it considers to be appropriate training and registration requirements. However, he is right to point out that there are many opportunities under the new system not only for dental technicians but for dental therapists and hygienists. As we change the way in which dentistry is provided, we can increasingly make better use of different skills in the dental team. I believe that, when we consider the role of dental nurses and hygienists in future, they can increasingly take on some of the minor work that dentists currently do, leaving dentists to do the more complex work. However, I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's points and I am sure that the GDC will be aware of his comments.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The Minister was about to consider access. Will she clarify a point about the position after 1 April? Will two people who live next door to each other, one registered with an NHS dentist and the other not, have different rights of access to NHS dentistry after 1 April? Does being on an NHS dentist's list now grant more rights than not being on such a list?

Ms Winterton: The person who is currently registered with an NHS dentist will remain attached to that dentist on a dental list. That is not the same as registration because people currently fall off the register. We want to stop that because it has caused difficulties in the past. However, the person who is currently registered will remain attached to his dentist. I hope that the changes that we are introducing will free capacity and that the person next door who is not registered with a dentist can get registered. We are aiming for that. That is why it is so important that primary care trusts have the power to commission locally, examine the needs of their population and commission accordingly.

Since 1999, we have set up 53 dental access centres in areas where there was a clear shortage of NHS dentists. Those centres mostly provide urgent treatment but some provide routine treatment. Compared with 2003, we are now investing an extra £250 million every year in NHS dentistry, with a further £65 million to follow next year. We have recruited the equivalent of more than 1,400 whole-time dentists to work in areas with the greatest access challenges.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) chose to denigrate the contribution of Polish dentists. In many areas of the country, they do an excellent job. In areas of particular shortage, we have been able to assist the position through careful international recruitment and carefully passing people on to those areas. I am sure that many Conservative Members are grateful for their contribution.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con) rose—

Ms Winterton: In the circumstances, I feel that I must give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Daniel Kawczynski: I am pleased that the Minister has acknowledged in the Chamber the tremendous work that Polish dentists do in the United Kingdom. Almost all the new dentists in Shrewsbury have come from Poland. I speak to many Polish NHS dentists in their mother tongue and they tell me that they will return to Poland after a couple of years. That is a tremendous problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Member will not spoil the moment by making a speech. Perhaps he could ask a final question.

Daniel Kawczynski: Will the Minister look into the difficulty caused by those Polish dentists being here on only a short-term basis?

Ms Winterton: I hope that I shall be able to reassure the hon. Gentleman later in my speech that there are dentists coming from all different quarters. NHS dentists are now offering to do more NHS work, and others are coming in through the international qualifying examination. Some of them may well wish to stay for only a short time, and that can be helpful in that they take different skills back to other parts of the European Union. I do not have a problem with that; it does not mean that we are going to experience a shortage. Indeed, in some ways, quite the opposite is the case.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): When I was out on a Saturday morning recently knocking on doors, as we do at the weekends, I met a Swedish dentist who thanked us for helping with his planning permission. May I thank the Minister for the £28.4 million investment that has been made in Plymouth, and ask her how soon she expects the new dentists to come on stream following that extra investment in dental training?

Ms Winterton: Obviously it takes some time to train a dentist. We have recruited extra dentists over the past year, as well as announcing 170 more dental training places from September last year. In January, I announced the creation of a new dental training school in the south-west of England, and I suspect that that is what my hon. Friend was referring to. I was pleased that a good bid was put in by her area, and that we were able to make that announcement.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that the reason why we can recruit dentists from all over Europe is that even those dentists who work for the NHS are among the highest paid in Europe?

Ms Winterton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I believe that 12 new dentists have been recruited to his area recently. A dentist with a fairly high commitment to the NHS can expect to earn about £80,000 a year, with practice expenses on top of that. That is not a bad deal.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): I am grateful to the Minister for working to bring 14 new dentists to my constituency. However, even with those new dentists, registrations have gone down since she came to the Isle of Wight. In two years' time, when the 24,000 people who have asked to register with those new dentists have done so, about 50,000 people in my constituency will still not be registered with an NHS dentist. Is that satisfactory?

Ms Winterton: As the hon. Gentleman said, I have visited his constituency. I know that there were considerable problems there, and I am glad that we have been able to assist him. His was one of the first areas that our support team went into to help with recruitment. I do not think that there were any NHS dentists there before that, but we managed to recruit eight into the area. I shall explain later how, under the present system, there will be room for extra capacity as the changes bed in, as well as the ability to have funding at local level to commission NHS dentistry if there are needs in the local area.

I want to explain how we are introducing a radical shake-up in regard to how NHS dentistry will be delivered in the long term. To go back to the basics of the plan, from April this year, primary care trusts will for the first time be able to commission and develop primary dental care services in ways that reflect the needs of their local populations. For the first time, they will have the financial power to commission new services when a dentist leaves the area or reduces their NHS commitment. That was one of the problems in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. For the first time, we will have a system of dental charges that is simple and transparent for patients, and a remuneration system that no longer encourages the drill and fill treadmill.

The new contract that we are offering to dentists will mean that a committed NHS dentist can expect to earn about £80,000 a year, with practice expenses on top of that. That £80,000 will be guaranteed for three years, for 5 per cent. less work. In return, dentists will be expected to carry out an agreed number of courses of treatment over the year—again, at least 5 per cent. below the levels in the old contract.

John Penrose (Weston-super-Mare) (Con): I am sure that dentists will be pleased to hear those figures. However, will the Minister explain how the technical application of the new contract has led to the situation in my constituency about which I wrote to the Secretary of State on 19 January? The single major NHS dentist in the area, whose practice covers 22,000 people, expects to lose 30 per cent. of those patients—that is, 6,500 people—as of 5 April, as a result of incorrect base-lining and problems with the calculations. I wrote to the Secretary of State about this on 19 January, and the clock is ticking. That dentist needs an answer.

Ms Winterton: The way in which the contracts were calculated involved a reference period that ran from October 2004 to September 2005. During that time, the activity of the dentists was measured, along with the amount that they were paid during the period. The calculation should reflect those two figures, and produce the amount that the dentist would be offered, which would be guaranteed for three years. If a dentist has a problem with the calculation, they should pursue the dispute resolution procedure. However, the primary care trust might be able to identify the reason for the problem—the dentist might have taken on an associate during the year, for example. It is difficult for me to comment on individual cases, but there is a dispute resolution procedure to deal with problems with the amount in the contract.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Is there not a problem for practices such as the Caledonia practice in my constituency, which is expanding fast and has taken on two dentists since the end of the base-line period last September, but is now having to lay off those dentists because it cannot afford to pay them, given the amount that it is being offered? Will the Minister also confirm that a PCT is required by law to use any funds made available through the closure of a dental practice for dentistry and for no other purpose?

Ms Winterton: Yes, I will. The way in which the budgets have been given out is quite complicated, but I will try to explain it. During the reference period that I mentioned, an overall measurement was taken of the activity in a particular area. It is possible that, during that time, certain dentists might have worked for only half the year, because they had started up half-way through the reference period. Others might have closed during the period. The calculation took into account the balance between those that had opened and those that had closed, so that a dental practice that had opened half-way through the year would be able to use the money that had become available from one that had closed. So that would have added up. If, however, it did not add up in that way, extra money would be allocated, but it would not be able to meet every local circumstance. The instance that the hon. Gentleman has cited involves a dental practice expanding after the reference period. We had to have a cut-off point—[HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Otherwise, it would not have been fair in terms of allocating the funds. The PCTs wanted to know the size of their budgets. We had that reference period so that we could make that calculation. On top of that I should say that £65 million has gone out to PCTs to ensure that there can be expansion. That is the difficulty that the hon. Gentleman might be facing. However, I should also say in relation to 31 March that the PCT will retain all its money locally. If there are dentists who decide that they do not want to stay with the NHS, the PCT will have the absolute right to go back to dentists such as those the hon. Gentleman has mentioned to say, "This is how we can replace the NHS dentistry that may have been lost." I am sorry if that is a rather long and complicated explanation, but that is basically how things work.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Winterton: May I move on? I am conscious that we are getting towards the time when Back-Bench Members will want to contribute.

Today's debate has shown that concerns have been voiced by some dentists about the changes, but that is not altogether surprising, because they are quite radical. New ways of working have proved popular in the personal dental services pilots, which cover some 30 per cent. of dentists.

To return to a point made by the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire about a system of payment per head for those registered, we considered that suggestion during the piloting and found a lot of problems, not least because in some areas the number of treatments carried out fell by about 50 per cent., but without an equivalent increase in the number of people seen. Such a system also has a bias towards people with good oral health who would be taken on under it.

I quite understand why the hon. Gentleman is making that suggestion and I am more than happy to send him the data—[Interruption.] If he wants to intervene, I am perfectly happy to give way.

Mr. Lansley: The National Audit Office report was very clear. Yes, there was a reduction in the number of treatments, because the drill-and-fill system had an incentive to overtreat. Of course the number of treatments reduced. We have to measure outcomes—that is what we should be doing—and the NAO was clear about the fact that the 10 per cent. reduction in treatments, on average, was none the less associated with no deterioration in the oral health of people on those patient lists.

Ms Winterton: But that is not the point about the system that the hon. Gentleman is suggesting. He is suggesting that each dentist be paid per patient. The difficulty with that, as I have said, is that we tried it in the pilot schemes and it effectively contained a bias towards taking on people with good oral health as opposed to those with a variety of types of oral health. I am perfectly happy to send him the data from those pilots so that he can look at them. All I am saying is that I can assure him that we considered and piloted that suggestion, but the evidence that came back suggested that it is not the right system.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Winterton: I give way to the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood).

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): Can the Minister explain why we do not have enough NHS dentists? Is it something to do with the extremely elaborate remuneration method, which seems to be freezing the system in aspic when we need a dynamic system that allows growth for new dentists?

Ms Winterton: That is quite astonishing, coming from the right hon. Gentleman. We have a lot of these problems—this is very well recognised—because of the contract changes and fee cuts made in the 1990s, as well as the closure of two dental schools. We are turning round the system that we inherited and introducing some changes.

Ms Winterton: I shall move on, because I want to make some remarks that I hope will help the House.

As I have said, I know that, for some dentists, the changes are a fundamental shift from the traditional way of working. Understandably, they are quite nervous about that, so I have decided to set up an implementation group with representation from the profession, patients and the NHS to review the impact of the reforms and ensure that they are delivering their intended benefits, for patients and for dentists. I have invited representatives from the British Dental Association to join the group, and I hope that that is a way to reassure dentists that we are looking closely at the implementation of the reforms and ensuring that if any adjustments need to be made, they can be.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend include orthodontists in the group? As has been mentioned, there seem to be specific problems with how the lists will be compiled for orthodontists. It is only fair that those valuable servants be included.

Ms Winterton: I will certainly consider the point my hon. Friend raises, particularly perhaps with reference to the British Orthodontic Society, which we have been in discussions with recently. He is right to say that there have been problems with orthodontics, because obviously such services are offered over a number of years. If new practices have been set up, which we have been able to do because of the increased investment that we have put in, they might have had a short contract value during the reference period. Recently, we have again issued guidance to PCTs including principles such as current treatment having to be completed. They need to look at orthodontic requirements locally and ensure that there is proper commissioning. I acknowledge that this has been a problem, but we have tried to clarify it.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Winterton: If I may, I shall move on, because it is important to say that we will not know until the end of this month precisely how many dentists are taking up the new contracts. However, the current view from PCTs is that the vast majority of contracts will be signed by 31 March.

I should stress that, in the minority of cases where dentists choose not to take up the new contracts, the NHS will use the same funding to commission replacement services from other dentists. I am extremely confident that the NHS will generally be able to bring in new capacity very quickly. In the small number of cases where people say that they no longer want to remain with the NHS, we are finding that other dentists are coming forward to say that they want to expand their NHS provision.

Mr. Lansley: Would the Minister like to tell us whether this alternative commissioning will be like the dental access centres? The average cost per patient episode, according to the Government's own figures, is £141 compared with £41 for high street dentists.

Ms Winterton: I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman has quite understood exactly how the new commissioning will take place. If a dentist chooses to leave the NHS, that money can be used by the PCT to provide what it feels is appropriate in the local area. If it feels it is appropriate to have a dental access centre, it can have one. However, it is more likely to want to commission dentistry from the existing dentists in the area.

Several hon. Members rose—

Ms Winterton: I shall give way to the hon. Member for Congleton (Ann Winterton), then I shall finish my remarks.

Ann Winterton: I rather suspect that the name has something to do with the Minister's giving way. Will she estimate the number of new dentists who will be appointed? How many of those will be directly employed by the NHS and not work for traditional NHS practices? As my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) said a moment ago, the cost of providing treatment in that way is about twice the normal cost at present.

Ms Winterton: May I explain? Most dentists are independent contractors anyway. They are paid by the NHS. Some have greater commitments to the NHS than others, but there are no private NHS dentists, as it were. At the same time, some dental access centres often provide emergency treatment, which we would necessarily expect to be more expensive, and do not always charge fees as well.

We would expect there to be a range of providers who might want to come in. It would be for the PCT to decide which kind of provider it wanted to use, whether a direct one, one through the salaried service, or an independent contractor in the normal way. As I have said, large numbers of NHS dentists are keen to expand their commitment. We know that, because that is what local PCT dental representatives have been telling us. Something like 1,000 overseas dentists are currently sitting the international qualifying examination, and a number of dental corporate bodies, which have a track record in areas such as the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) in Cumbria, have expressed an interest in establishing new practices, and are already taking up new NHS contracts.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): The East Kent Coastal primary care trust has repeated the Minister's mantra that money "saved" by dentists leaving the national health service will be used to buy other dentists. The fact is that those other dentists do not exist. Existing dentists' lists are already full and have a backlog. Dentists in east Kent are closing or leaving the NHS. There is a gap, and children in particular are waiting for dentists. Where will those dentists come from?

Ms Winterton: I think that I just explained what the PCT is entitled to do, and probably will do, if there are not dentists in the area. For example, dental corporate bodies are keen to establish NHS dentistry, making use of some of the 1,000 dentists currently sitting the international qualifying examination. The hon. Gentleman must recognise that the money remains at local level so that the PCT can commission dentistry. There is no reason why it would not be able to do so. It has happened in other parts of the country, and I am confident that it could happen in his area, too.

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con) rose—

Ms Winterton: I have explained how budgets were to be spent. The budgets that will be devolved to PCTs next year are around £315 million more than in 2003–04. As I have said, all existing NHS dentists are guaranteed contract values based on their NHS earnings during the reference period.

I also want to set the record straight with regard to two other misapprehensions about the reforms.

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD) rose—

Ms Winterton: First, I am afraid that the British Dental Association, among others, has persisted in alleging that the reforms do not promote preventive dentistry. That goes against the clear evidence from personal dental services pilots showing that abolishing the fee-per-item system enables dentists to carry out simpler courses of treatment, with far fewer interventions and far more time to focus on preventive care.

Secondly, the new system of patient charges has been based on the recommendations of a working group chaired by Harry Cayton, National Director for Patients and the Public, including representatives from the British Dental Association among other stakeholders. The working group unanimously recommended a system based on three simple charge bands. At present, there are more than 400 separate charges for different items of treatment. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. If Opposition Front Benchers want to intervene, they ought to do so in the normal way.

Mr. Lansley: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Winterton: Of course.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful to the Minister. Will she therefore explain why the Cayton review recommended £11 for band 1, and she has £15.50; £27.50 for band 2, and she has £42.40; and £127.50 for band 3, and she has £189?

Ms Winterton: It is because the recommendations of the Cayton review on cost per band were meant to reflect the patient charges that would be raised during the time that it was produced—around January 2004, I think. Obviously, when we published it, we had to take into account the increased expenditure on NHS dentistry, and we wanted to raise the same amount in proportion in terms of NHS dentistry. The hon. Gentleman fails to mention over and over again that the maximum that can now be paid for NHS dentistry has been cut from £384 to £189, which particularly affects older and poorer people.

Steve McCabe: Surely there is something less than sincere about the position of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). He talks about his concern for NHS charges, but earlier today was happy to support unscrupulous dentists who are exploiting elderly, vulnerable people. Where is the consistency?

Ms Winterton: Consistency has not been a hallmark of the contribution from the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire today. As I have said, the new system makes it much easier for patients to distinguish between what they are paying for under the NHS and what they are paying for privately.

I want to finish by reminding the House of the broader objectives to which the reforms are designed to contribute. We want to support further improvements in oral health and reduce inequalities in oral health. We want to promote high-quality dentistry throughout the NHS. We want to improve access to services for NHS patients. I agree that the full benefits will not arise immediately.

Mark Pritchard: Will the Minister confirm that her Department will allow primary care trusts the freedom to procure dental health services from anywhere in England if, for instance, my constituents were waiting an intolerable amount of time?

Ms Winterton: I want the hon. Gentleman's primary care trust to ensure that there is appropriate provision locally. We can help support primary care trusts by providing them with extra money, which we have done, and a contract worked out with dentists that reduces bureaucracy and allows better care for patients, which we have done; and through measures such as the international qualifying exam to ensure that NHS dentistry can be provided locally The improvements in access will rely in part on the growing use that primary care trusts make of their new flexibilities under local commissioning. They will also rely on dentists adapting to new ways of working, which free up time, as we have seen from the pilots, and increase capacity to enable a greater number of patients to be seen.

Mr. Hurd: A specific concern of dentists in my constituency is that devolved budgets appear to be ring-fenced for only three years. Hillingdon PCT is wrestling with a deficit of £25 million, and dentists are concerned that in time funds will simply be siphoned off from dentistry into other medical priorities. Does the Minister understand those concerns, and what reassurance can she give?

Ms Winterton: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is pleased that there is ring-fencing for three years. Beyond that, I cannot predict or give guarantees. We have, however, ensured the ability to ring-fence, and introduced a duty on PCTs to provide dentistry to meet local needs. I hope that that is some reassurance.

I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will recognise the scale of what we have achieved, both in growing the dental work force and tackling some deep-rooted access problems. I hope that the House will welcome the reforms as providing a hugely more secure basis on which the NHS can build on improvements, working in partnership with patients and members of the dental profession. It would be irresponsible to halt the changes as the Opposition motion suggests. It would cause immense confusion to dentists, patients and the NHS, and take us right back to the bureaucratic drill-and-fill treadmill so disliked by the dental profession. The Opposition have offered no new ideas, only carping at the sidelines. I urge the House to reject their motion and to support the Government amendment.

1.50 pm

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): D-day for NHS dental patients is rapidly approaching. The new financial year will bring many changes to dentistry—a new contract, new charges, and a new way of measuring dental activity—but the key question is, are patients really aware of the bombshell that could drop on them in the new financial year? For them, D-day will be deregistration day. On 1 April NHS dentists will be subject to the new contract, but how many dentists will decide that because of it, the NHS is no longer for them? How many patients will find themselves deregistered, with a choice between paying for the same dentist and taking a gamble, and trying to find another NHS dentist with vacancies on his list? Has the Minister or her Department made any estimate of the number of dentists who will refuse to sign a contract that the British Dental Association has called, among other things, "a shambles", given that yesterday was the last day on which NHS dentists could sign and guarantee payment on time?

How many dentists does the Minister estimate will not have signed the new contract by the deadline at the end of this month? How many does she believe will sign the contract, but at the same time formally enter into dispute proceedings? The Minister talks of "the vast majority", but a more specific figure would be appreciated.

In addition to their initial contract agreement, 75 per cent. of dentists in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Yardley (John Hemming) have signed a letter stating:

"We wish to clarify that the figures referred to in that memorandum are not accepted as being a definitive correct representation of our earnings . . . in relation to the provision of NHS dental care . . . and that they represent only a provisional representation of our earnings and activity. For the avoidance of doubt, we reserve our right to initiate the statutory dispute procedures in respect of either the figures provided, or the basis on which those figures have been calculated."

How many dentists does the Minister estimate will enter into dispute proceedings at the same time as signing the initial agreement?

Paul Rowen: Is my hon. Friend aware that in Heywood and Middleton, the constituency next to mine, every dental practice is refusing to sign the contract? That will leave Heywood and Middleton with no NHS dentists, which is already virtually the case in Rochdale.

Julia Goldsworthy: The position is similar in many parts of the country.

Linda Gilroy: The hon. Lady represents an area with some of the lowest wages in the United Kingdom. Does she not think her constituents will find it a little strange that she appears to support the position of people who consider £80,000 a year to be an income not worth working very hard for?

Julia Goldsworthy: I am sure that patients of NHS dentists will be more interested in the fact that the cost of check-ups and band 2 treatments will increase, and the fact that they may not be able to find an NHS dentist at all.

For 9,000 patients in my constituency, D-day—deregistration day—has already arrived. Last week, one of the biggest NHS dental surgeries in the constituency announced that its 9,000 adult NHS patients would either have to go elsewhere for NHS treatment, or have one week in which to decide whether to sign up for a direct debit plan and private treatment.

Mr. Redwood: Will the hon. Lady tell us what is the Liberal Democrat plan for recruiting more dentists, and how much it would cost?

Julia Goldsworthy: We would of course continue to negotiate the contract, which the British Dental Association has clearly rejected but which the Government seem to be pushing relentlessly, although it appears that many dentists will not sign it. According to the Minister, the vast majority may be signing. That could mean thousands of patients per dentist being denied access to NHS treatment.

The dental surgery that I mentioned has three dentists. They gave their reasons for withdrawing from the NHS, which were very specific. They said that "a new NHS system is being proposed by the government and we have been unable to negotiate terms that we feel are in the best interests of our adult patients. We will therefore not be able to treat patients in the NHS from 1 April 2006."

My constituents who are affected are understandably shocked, and do not know what to do next. I have been inundated with correspondence from them, asking what they should do. For many, the choices are stark. One wrote:

"Can't afford the monthly fee offered—and this doesn't cover anything I need anyway".

Another wrote:

"We are shocked that we had no previous knowledge and had not been consulted about this closure, and we are being forced into signing up within a week to a costly private scheme or losing all further treatment".

Those people do not feel that there will suddenly be a magic alternative.

Mr. Martlew: Will the hon. Lady condemn the dentists who have caused so much suffering to her constituents?

Julia Goldsworthy: Many of the dentists to whom I have spoken feel that they cannot offer their patients the level of service that they deserve under the current contract.

All over the country, as other Members have said, thousands of NHS patients are hearing similar bad news. Many of them do not realise that the Government's policy is creating the problem, at a time when NHS dentistry is already in crisis. Another of my constituents wrote:

"We do not know about the new government proposals mentioned in their letter that they are using as an excuse".

They clearly have not had time to read the new leaflet explaining the changes.

Ultimately, however, the patients do not care what is causing the problem. They may not know that dentistry's woes started with the Conservative Government's creation of the drill-and-fill treadmill, and the closure of two dental schools. They may not know that the breakdown in negotiations over the new contract has proved to be the final straw for many dentists. All they know is that they face losing their NHS provision, and it is not clear how they will find an affordable alternative.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): Will the hon. Lady at least acknowledge that the new dental school that is coming to Plymouth will provide new dentists not only in Plymouth but in the wider south-west, including Cornwall?

Julia Goldsworthy: In five years' time, once it is up and running, the dental school will provide new dentists, but there is no guarantee that they will enter the NHS. Moreover, if the current funding is based on levels of activity, there will be no vacancies for them in Cornwall even if they want to enter the NHS.

Linda Gilroy: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Julia Goldsworthy: I am afraid I must make some progress.

Yet another horde of dentists look set to abandon the NHS, as they did in the early 1990s. The only difference is that a different political party is in power. The new contract does not mean more dentists for the NHS. Primary care trusts may have access to funds for alternative NHS dental surgery provision when existing dentists leave the NHS, but how does the Minister estimate that PCTs will be able to recruit enough dentists to fill the vacancies? In Cornwall 9,000 patients are being deregistered, while 14,000 are being deregistered in Cheltenham. How will those vacancies be filled? Where is the capacity for all the dentists who are so desperate to sign the new contract? Stockton-on-Tees already has eight vacancies. If more dentists refuse to sign the contract, the number of vacancies will increase.

The new contract does not automatically mean that more people will be treated in the NHS, because it is based on the existing number of dentists and their budgets. No assessment or investment has been made with a view to meeting previously unmet demand, and it is not clear how the Government will fulfil their 1999 pledge to give everyone access to an NHS dentist. That means that even in my constituency, which ought to benefit from a dental school, more cannot be spent on a net increase in the number of dentists or in NHS provision unless the Government are prepared to ensure that extra funds are available, and unless more dentists feel that the NHS offers a contract that is attractive to them.

There are plenty of new circumstances, but there is no improvement in the current dire situation. Millions of people are not registered with a dentist at all, and three quarters of those who are not registered with an NHS dentist say that they wish they were. Demand continues to outstrip supply by a significant amount, and the new contract will not change that fundamentally. The contract will also fail to provide patients who are lucky enough to receive treatment with better standards of treatment, and a stronger focus on preventive work.

The personal dental services pilot was popular because it allowed dentists to spend more time with their patients, and to focus on preventive advice as much as on treatment. It ended the drill-and-fill treadmill. Most of the dentists who are refusing to sign the new contract took part in the pilot, although it has been much vaunted as a reason for the contract. They feel that flexibility has been lost in the new general dental services contract because a new treadmill has been introduced: units of dental activity. It is another target-driven system that does not appear to be well understood on the ground either by dentists or primary care trusts, and it is essentially untested. It was not in the initial pilot.

Ms Rosie Winterton: Does the hon. Lady accept that we should be able to monitor and measure dental activity, given the amount that we spend on it locally? How would she monitor dental activity?

Julia Goldsworthy: I would like the Department to monitor dentists on a full-time equivalent basis, rather than on a head-count basis. I have used this example before: I have spoken to a dentist who is on the NHS list and who has three NHS patients—his wife and two children.

Paul Holmes (Chesterfield) (LD): Does my hon. Friend agree that the Minister's speech was strong on wishful thinking and weak on reality? The reality for my constituents in Chesterfield is that the wonderful new contract has driven dentists to leave the NHS. In recent weeks, a wave of my constituents have come to me to say that they have been given the choice between taking out expensive private medical insurance and looking for another dentist. However, when they look for another dentist, it is almost impossible to find any slack in the system that enables new NHS patients to be taken on.

Julia Goldsworthy: That has been the experience in many other places. Of course, it is outcomes that are most important, rather than the treadmill of units of dental activity.

As we have heard, local dental committees report real concerns about the test year. The new UDA targets are based on the test year, but do not account for variances during the year, which could result in contract values that do not represent the NHS work that is undertaken. The system has not been piloted. I am pleased to hear that a review is to be conducted, but what will the Government do to implement the review group's recommendations? When will it be set up? Will it be in time for the introduction of the new contract on 1 April?

Will we know whether more patients are accessing NHS treatment if it is courses of treatment, rather than registrations, that will be measured? What will happen to waiting lists at NHS dentists if people stay on the register permanently? Will we see a massive increase in registrations, with many patients struggling to get a check-up on the NHS within two, three or four years? Will there be any measurement of how long the average time is between check-ups for the average patient?

Ms Rosie Winterton: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Julia Goldsworthy: I will if the Minister will allow me to make some progress.

If that means that people will go longer between check-ups, how can that be squared with the Government's stated aim to shift their focus to preventive work? Under the new system, people will go to a dentist only if there is a problem.

Ms Winterton: Again, I do not think that the hon. Lady quite understands the system. The NICE guidelines have changed. It is up to the dentist to decide when a patient should come back. Some patients will have to come back within six months, but the point about the flexibility in the new way of working is that, if the dentist believes that the patient has good oral health and does not need to be seen for two years, that is when the patient would come back.

Julia Goldsworthy: Of course, if there are not enough dentists, how will those patients be able to access the regular check-ups that they need?

That leads me on to the final changes, those to pricing structures—changes that, ultimately, the patients will notice. The price of a check-up will increase, surely deterring people from having regular check-ups, where not just caries but problems such as mouth cancers are detected, and where the preventive work that the Government claim is so important is performed.

[Julia Goldsworthy]

The new pricing structure means that the median price will increase, even though the charges for the most expensive treatments will reduce. According to the BDA, three quarters of the 42 per cent. of patients who fall into the middle band will end up paying more than they did previously. That will lead to perverse incentives, where problems will be stored up, so that the treatment is more affordable and represents better value for money for the patient. I have raised that issue with the Minister in previous debates and she has refused to accept it, but I quote one of my constituents to emphasise the point:

"any problem that I have with my teeth I will now have to suffer as there is no way I can afford the charges."

People are coming to me saying, "If I understand the new charging system correctly, it makes better sense for me to wait until I need two or three fillings and I can pay for them under one band, through one course of treatment, rather than having them one at a time, and paying three times for the same treatment."

Primary care trusts are also concerned that the new charges and the new contracts will lead to even greater pressures being placed on emergency treatment centres. Previously, emergency treatment centres would accept only patients who were not registered with an NHS dentist. Now they will have to accept everyone. With emergency treatment cheaper than a band 2 course of treatment, there are concerns that people will wait until their problem is an emergency.

It is also unclear how many and how well people understand what the new charging structures are and how they will be affected by them. I understand that the new information leaflets have been sent to primary care trusts and are sitting in NHS dental surgeries. Have the Government estimated the penetration of those leaflets and what the level of understanding is now about the new charges, given that they will be put in place on 1 April? Has the Minister's Department undertaken an evaluation report and, if so, will she be prepared to publish it? Will patients see the leaflet only when they go for a check-up? Will some patients know nothing about the new charging structure because they went for a check-up before Christmas and were told to come back in a year? They will not know that the price of their check-up will increase significantly the next time they go for a check-up. Does she think that that is fair and proper?

Ms Rosie Winterton: I hope that the hon. Lady realises that, under the new system, it is not just an ordinary check-up that is undertaken. It is an examination, plus preventive health advice, plus a scale and polish if necessary, plus any diagnostics, for example, X-rays. That all comes within the £15 range.

Julia Goldsworthy: Of course, all the patients will know is that it is more expensive than last time. I would be interested to know how many leaflets have been produced, and how many have been sent to NHS and private dental surgeries, in case patients wish to switch to the NHS if they can. At what cost have they been produced? I understand that an evaluation report has been produced and I hope that the Minister will undertake to place it in the Library of the House.

The theme that sadly emerges is one of a series of unknowns. A series of fundamental changes are being introduced but there has not been adequate testing and piloting to determine the changes' knock-on effects individually, let alone in combination. For those reasons, it is hardly surprising that patients, dentists and primary care trusts are still unclear about what the new contract will represent and what impact it will have. Since the Government did not spend the time in advance of the changes assessing their impact, I am glad to hear that a review group will be set up, but will the Minister undertake to implement its recommendations?

The new contract and charging system has not produced the circumstances or incentives for patients to take a preventive approach to their health care. The cost of a basic check-up will increase, dentists will not have the time that they want to spend on preventive work, and it does not appear that more people will necessarily have access to NHS dentistry as a result of the changes. Ultimately, people will go for regular check-ups only if they can afford them, if they understand how the new system works, and if they can find an NHS dentist. It seems that many of the problems still remain essentially unresolved.

2.8 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): Before I get into my speech, I should like to thank all the hard-working dentists in my constituency and throughout the country who work well with the NHS. Sometimes, in my local skirmishes with some of my dentists, I have perhaps forgotten that.

Did not the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) think it odd that the dentist whom she mentioned treated only his family on the NHS? Did she not think that that was a bit of sharp practice? Perhaps I am naive. Perhaps she can put his name on the record so we can all know who it is.

I have sat and watched the Opposition—the major Opposition, because there is no one here from Lloyd George's party. One of the Conservative Members who attended the debate was a Minister in the previous Government and a practising dentist. The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) has just left, but he was in the Cabinet when the Conservative Government closed two dental schools. It is no good Conservative Members putting up their hands up and saying that that was 10 years ago. They did it and they also cut fees by 7 per cent. So do not imagine that dentists, even though they are angry with us, believe the Conservatives. They remember what being a dentist was like under the Conservatives. The haemorrhage of dentists away from the NHS started during their time in office, whether by accident or design; I leave Members to figure out which it was for themselves.

There was a severe problem in Carlisle when four dental practices decided to resign from the NHS. They resigned before they saw the contract, so that was not their reason for doing so. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) mentioned people queuing to sign up for private treatment, and that did indeed happen at a particular practice in my constituency. The dentist in charge of it sent out a letter saying, "If you don't queue up and sign up, bringing your bank details with you, you won't be able to get a place." That resulted in hundreds of my constituents queuing from 5.30 in the morning, waiting to sign up. [Interruption.] If the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire will contain himself, I will get to the point. That dentist was even handing out raffle tickets in another part of Cumbria. He said that he was going to cut the list, and that those who did not sign up early would be unable to get on it.

A lady came to my constituency office on Friday and told me that she phoned that dentist four months later. The receptionist was over the moon that someone had actually phoned to ask whether they could sign up. In fact, the dentist had plenty of places left. Some dentists who have gone private will have a problem when—

Mark Pritchard: The hon. Gentleman and I share a concern about animal welfare issues, and I want to make the serious point that, unfortunately, because of these changes, it is easier for my constituents' pet dogs to get dental treatment in Shropshire than it is for my constituents to get such treatment.

Mr. Martlew: I do not know about the situation in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, but the reality is that in most cases—leaving aside the valuable work done by the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals—those of us who take our animals to the vet have to pay for such treatment. I presume that pets in the hon. Gentleman's constituency are not treated on the NHS; if they are, there should perhaps be an inquiry.

The dental practice to which I was referring offered the caveat whereby the children of patients who signed up and set up a direct debit would be treated for free. That is an absolute disgrace. Unfortunately, neither the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire nor the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) condemned such practice; hopefully, they can put that right during the wind-ups.

Let us not be too concerned about dentists' earnings. Back Benchers are paid about £60,000 a year and most of us manage to live quite well on that. As the Minister said, an independent dentist with a good commitment to the NHS—and who probably does a little private work as well—earns in excess of £80,000 a year and gets a further £60,000 toward practice costs. A dentist who works for the NHS, but not as an independent contractor, could expect, after two years, to earn more than a Back-Bench MP—some £65,000—but with no practice costs. So dentists in my area, which is a low-wage area, are not badly paid.

Mrs. Nadine Dorries (Mid-Bedfordshire) (Con): The hon. Gentleman is very lucky that only four dentists in his constituency are refusing to take on NHS work. The NHS Direct website has a list of all the dentists in Bedfordshire and, as of today, 20 of those 41 dentists are refusing to accept any new NHS patients for treatment; of the remaining 21, only 11 will register children. So many of my constituents will be unable to find NHS treatment.

Mr. Martlew: The hon. Lady is obviously a very good MP but I am sure that she does not represent all of Bedfordshire. To compare my constituency to Bedfordshire is to compare apples and pears, which is what the Conservatives usually do.

Let us look at why dentists are saying that they want to leave the NHS. They say that they do not understand the new contract and that they are concerned about the loss of independence, but the reality is that they realise that it is a question of supply and demand. They realise that they can make more in the private sector, and that they can probably work less hard for that money. Also—Members have yet to pick up on this point—they are being targeted by the insurance industry. They are being asked, "Don't you realise how much you could make if you use our particular plan?" Let us never forget that the insurance industry is the enemy of the NHS. Those who want to see where the big money in insurance is should go to America. We must treat with caution the private insurance companies working in this field.

The dental reforms are welcome. An extra £360 million or more is being spent on improving dental services, and when a dentist leaves the NHS, the primary care trust in question will retain the relevant funding. At this point, I should congratulate my local PCT—Opposition Members have offered little thanks to PCTs—which has worked hard to ensure that people can access NHS dentistry. In particular, I congratulate the senior manager, Michael Smillie, on the tremendous work that he has done. Last week, we announced the provision of eight new dentists in Carlisle and Penrith. They will take on 20,000 patients and in doing so will probably clear the waiting list. Extra dentists will also be provided in Workington and Whitehaven—I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Mr. Reed) is in his place—so we are tackling the problem. It will not be solved in a day, and I am not saying that all dentists are happy with the contract, but the vast majority are working with it and people will see the difference.

The Minister has announced a new dental school—she kindly sent me a copy of the press release—for north Lancashire and Cumbria. That brand new facility, to be located at the Cumberland infirmary, will add to the excellent work already being done by its education centre. In training new dentists, it will thereby make up the shortfall. Be it dentists or doctors, the view is that, where they are trained is where they stay, so in four or five years' time we will have new dentists in our region. That said, I have no problem with dentists coming over from, for example, other parts of Europe. Patients tend not to have big conversations with their dentist.

I congratulate the Minister on the points that she made about the contract and I am glad that she has decided to review it. The Conservatives failed dentists when they were last in power, and they have failed to cost their current proposals. I doubt whether the people of this country, even if they are concerned about dentistry, will turn to the Conservatives.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that there is a 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches.

2.19 pm

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): It is fairly well known that I have a slight interest in this subject. The Conservative Whips certainly know that, and they took the risk that I might not be entirely on message.

I want to congratulate the Minister on two things. First, she has managed—almost, if not entirely, on her own—to upset just about every NHS dentist in general practice in the country. Secondly, the implementation group that she has set up sounds really positive. It is a mark of recognition, finally, that there are problems with the contract. Those problems may have more to do with perception, but they need to be looked at.

Most general dental practitioners doing NHS dentistry or offering a mixture of NHS and private treatment want to continue to provide that service. Earlier, we got an inkling of the degree of willingness on the part of the Government in that respect, and that is what is needed to make progress. The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) said that there were some sharp dentists out there, but that is true of every profession. However, they are a minority: most dentists are straightforward people who want to provide a mixed service because they have to face their patients, to whom it is virtually impossible to say no.

I want to dodge most of the complaints usually raised in a debate such as this, and concentrate on a slightly different matter. The hon. Member for Carlisle spoke about what happened 10, 20 or 30 years ago, but there has been a dramatic change in the quality of dentistry on offer in this country. The teaching that dentists receive is vastly better, as is the quality of the materials that are available. Dentists are able to do much more for patients, but even more dramatic are the changes in what patients now demand. The things that people ask for are more the province of private dentistry than the NHS, and that means that dentists must be able to offer choice. That is the burden of my contribution, and it is something that I hope that the Minister will reflect on.

In that connection, I want to touch on two matters—the treadmill, and mixed provision. The Minister said that the treadmill had disappeared these days. Like everyone else, I expect that she will have received a letter from Dr. Adrian Kinnear-King, in Norfolk. In his very bitter letter, Dr. Kinnear-King says that he is a socialist, a long-standing member of the Labour party, and an NHS dentist. Although he seemed to be asking me for my personal help with the Labour party, I thought that I would telephone him anyway.

Dr. Kinnear-King has not signed his contract so far. In fact, he has not received one yet, but he has looked at some of its contents. He may decide not to sign it at all, but he says that there is no real treadmill under the present system. If he wants a break, he can take one, and he can also work a bit harder if that is what he wants to do. However, the introduction of targets that he has to meet means that he will get a phone call from the local PCT if he falls behind. He does not like the new contractual treadmill, or the way in which it has been introduced.

If Dr. Kinnear-King fails to meet his monthly UDA target, the PCT will want an explanation. Technically, it can claw back money from him, or take other action. I hope that most PCTs will wake up to reality and not be so draconian. They need to work with dentists who fail to meet their targets and find out why that has happened, as sometimes the fault lies with the proportions assigned in a mixed service.

I listened with care to the Liberal Democrat spokesperson, the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy). This may upset her, but I can tell her that what she said is guaranteed to get dentists walking out of the NHS in droves. Dentists have some difficulties with the present system, as negotiating a change in the size of the contract or the mixture of services that it covers can take two or three months. I am sure that we can do better than that.

The Minister panned the Opposition motion, but it contains the vital proposal that "everyone should have to access to NHS dentistry".

That commitment does not appear in the Government's amendment, even though it is extremely important.

I have something else for the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne to think about. A patient who presents to an NHS or mixed dentist suffering from pain in her lower-left third molar, for instance, will be offered a choice of treatments—NHS amalgam, for example, or the latest treatments using bonded composites, or a gold inlay, or an inlay-overlay in porcelain. Those might be her options, but what is important in the end is that the treatment gets done: that is what counts, not whether the treatment is NHS or private.

Under the new contract, the NHS amalgam option means that the dentist will achieve more UDAs. If he does not perform that treatment, he has fewer UDAs. As Dr. Kinnear-King notes in his letter, those UDAs have to be made up with other patients.

Nowadays, patients want choice. The more choice that they get, the more private dentists' fees will come down. If the fees are too high, the dentists will not fill their appointment books. That shows that the market can also work to the advantage of patients.

Dr. Kinnear-King offers a better example of that. He says that a patient who comes in with teeth that are intact but badly stained—perhaps by tetracycline, for example—is likely to give him a big, broad, ugly smile. When I asked him what he would do as treatment, he said that he would get out his screaming diamond burr and apply it at 500,000 revs. He would use it to tear around the tooth enamel and put on 16 sparkling new NHS porcelain veneers—

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Oh!

Sir Paul Beresford: I am sorry to upset the hon. Lady. My voice is not pitched high enough to make what I am saying even more emphatic. The process that I am describing would secure lots of UDAs, and the dentist would have to do it all again after a few years, when the gingiva had moved. Once more, he would achieve lots more UDAs, but what that dentist would want ideally is to be able to offer the patient an opportunity to go for private treatment as well. The best treatment would be to spend hours carefully bleaching her teeth. That would leave her with a broad and beautiful smile, intact teeth, and no need to repeat the treatment.

However, Dr. Kinnear-King says that he feels that he cannot undertake the bleaching treatment, because he is looking over his shoulder at the avalanche that is the monthly UDA total. Somehow, the Government have to change the position that dentists find themselves in.

In his letter, Dr. Kinnear-King says that he is a solid socialist, but that he is seriously considering not signing the contract. He intends to go private, but says that he will keep the fees down so that he can offer his patients the service that they need. As I remember from my own experience as a full-time dentist, the problem is that some people cannot afford even low fees.

The Minister's implementation team will have to look very carefully at how the mixture of NHS and private treatment can be introduced. It must also find a way to ease the treadmill, or dentists will continue to walk away from the NHS. We have enough dentists, and will soon have more than enough, but they must be encouraged to stay with the NHS. The present contract, and the way that it has been implemented, is achieving the exact opposite of that.

Natascha Engel (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): I am pleased to be able to contribute to this very important debate, although the description of treatment given by the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) was really quite disgusting. Dentistry affects us all in different ways—

Ms Rosie Winterton: It touches a raw nerve.

Natascha Engel: That is right, it does touch a very raw nerve.

Sir Paul Beresford: I hope that I can help the hon. Lady. Many dentists are moving into the private sector, but I assure her that most patients feel more pain from the white envelope containing their bill than they do from the treatment that they receive.

Natascha Engel: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that, although my recent personal experience with a dentist from Bulgaria does not quite fit with what he describes.

I want to thank the Tories for devoting one of their Opposition days to dentistry—

Ann Winterton: Her Majesty's official Opposition.

Natascha Engel: I thank the hon. Lady for that.

The problems associated with getting dental treatment cause more people to come to my surgeries, write to me and send me e-mails than just about any other issue. Their concern is mainly generated by letters that they have received from their dentists explaining that they are no longer taking on NHS patients or are opting out of the NHS. It is important, therefore, to consider why we are introducing these reforms to dentistry.

Everyone, even the Tories, would agree that there are not enough dentists, that provision is unequal, that access is difficult and that the Government are trying to respond to the concerns of both the public and dentists. Everyone, even the Tories, wants better access to treatment and to promote good oral health. We have heard a lot today about the difficulties that people have experienced, but we have heard almost nothing from the Opposition on proposals for changes that they readily admit are very necessary.

I do not deny that we are in a difficult situation. Almost all the dentists in my constituency have already decided not to sign the NHS contract and I agree that we need to do more to attract dentists to stay in the NHS. However, would not our time be better spent today discussing some constructive proposals and ideas on how to do that?

The Government have always worked on the principle that prevention is better than cure. We want to ensure that dental recall periods are based on clinical need, rather than on automatic six-month check-ups. We want to free up dentists' time to see a range of patients and provide additional NHS services, such as promoting oral health.

I have terrible teeth and have been to many dentists, so I have met far more dentists in a professional capacity than I would want to. All of them, without exception, are committed to providing oral health care and preventive medicine to the highest standard. However, preventive measures are increasingly being hampered by sweets in supermarkets and it is surprising that that has not been mentioned yet today. It was not until recently, when I took my two-year-old shopping, that I noticed a whole bank of sweets, at adult knee-level, lining the channel to the supermarket check-out. Everyone knows that sugar and sweets cause tooth decay, so why is that still happening?

Julia Goldsworthy: I understand that there was a private Member's Bill on children's food, which the Government did not support. Would the measures in that Bill have helped to alleviate the problem that the hon. Lady describes?

Natascha Engel: I understand that we are adopting similar measures. What I would really like to know is why the Opposition have not made any mention of the link between sweets in supermarkets and reforms in dentistry. It sounds a trivial matter, but it is very important when we are discussing preventive medicine. Our oral health plan at least takes a more holistic approach to prevention by aiming to improve oral health and to reduce health inequalities. We propose to do that by increasing the use of fluoride to help to prevent tooth decay, improving diets and reducing sugar intake. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will meet the parents jury of the Chuck Snacks Off the Checkout! Campaign, which I intend to join. We will also encourage preventive dental care; aim to reduce smoking to tackle oral cancer—the ban on smoking in public places will go a long way to achieving that—increase early detection of mouth cancer; and reduce dental injuries such as those caused by contact sports. I have heard no positive or constructive proposals from the Opposition to match those ambitious plans.

I do not claim that everything in dentistry is fine, but I would rather look for ways to improve the situation. I will meet the chief executive of my primary care trust in north-east Derbyshire and dentists in my constituency to find a local solution. These reforms coincide with the reorganisation of primary care trusts. Let us ensure that the outcome of our reforms will enable PCTs to place with an NHS dentist anyone who wants one.

Poor people are more likely to have poor oral health. Poor people are not in a position to pay for private dental care. We do not want to exacerbate inequalities but to ensure that everyone has access to an NHS dentist. Oral health is too important to be used for political point-scoring, so let us hear some good ideas.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): I shall make a short speech, because I have one simple point to make. I have some 78,000 people in my constituency and, on the whole, no NHS dentists, so those people have nowhere to go. It is not a question of the NHS being free at the point of delivery: it is failing at the point of delivery. There are no NHS dentists. The Minister knows that we have had busloads of Polish dentists coming to set up in south Devon, and we now have a few of those, but on the whole there are no NHS dentists. That is the first problem that the Minister must address.

The issue is not about having high-powered discussions about drilling people's teeth out. There are no NHS dentists to drill people's teeth out. I must declare an interest, in that my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) is my dentist. He is an experienced and very skilled dentist. I hope that the House will excuse the slight lisp with which I speak, which is because of a slight problem we have had. My hon. Friend's concern is the care of patients and the access that they have to treatment. What do I say to a garage forecourt man who, when I spoke to him the other day, had a very swollen cheek? I asked him what was wrong and he said that he had an abscess. He said that he could not afford to go to the dentist, because they are all private in our area. He said that he had gone to the doctor—that service is free at the point of delivery—and got some antibiotics to try to reduce the swelling. I know how painful an abscess is and the necessity of immediate treatment, so it is criminal that the NHS system does not work in our area.

What should small children and elderly people do? I have the ninth oldest constituency in the country—not the Member of Parliament, but the constituents—and they are one of the groups of people that need quick access to dentists. Because I have a large rural constituency—it runs 30 or so miles one way and 40 or so the other—we have no adequate public transport. What do we say to such people? We are supposed to be the fourth or fifth—I think that the Chinese have just overtaken us—richest country in the world.

I do not wish to get into the detail of the contracts, but I wish to ask the Minister whether dentists will end up like opticians, who are now outside the NHS. Everybody applauds the Minister's frankness and her integrity, but is it really the Government's intention to get rid of NHS dentistry that is free at the point of delivery? If not, why do we make it so complicated? What are these units of dental activity? Does it depend on the dentists themselves being very active? It is another example of weasel words—the Government are wonderful at using them. Does it mean that if the dentist rushes around his consulting room, he gets an extra point? Or is it based on something more that he does for the patient?

Can the Minister tell me why one dental practice in Plymouth is being offered £22 per unit of dental activity, when the next-door dental practice—I know them both, although I have not used them both—is offered only £14 per UDA? What is wrong with the £14 UDA dentist? Will people who go to the £22 UDA dentist get better dentistry? The Minister is trying to marry two services that are irreconcilable—a salaried service and an individual, private service. The result is that few people will be offered free services by their dentist.

Mr. Geoffrey Cox (Torridge and West Devon) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that the problem in his constituency, which is contiguous with mine, is in fact Devon-wide? I have just been sent an e-mail from a Devonshire dentist who tells me that in north Devon

"2 practices have already deregistered for adult patients. 3 practices are now on the brink of refusing to sign the new contract."

In my constituency, no dentist is accepting national health service patients. The situation is the same across the entire county.

Mr. Steen: People will clearly be able to tell which constituents come from Devon; they will all have black teeth and swollen cheeks. They will all be suffering from bad teeth because Devon does not have NHS dentists. This is not just about Totnes; my constituency covers parts of five local authorities—the Dartmoor national park, Devon county council, Teignbridge district council, South Hams district council and the Torbay unitary authority. They all have the same problem.

I understand why the Minister is no longer in her place; she can no longer face us. What are we to say to people in Torridge and West Devon and in Totnes? From what the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Natascha Engel) said, if she had visited only NHS dentists she would probably have no teeth left—perhaps she does not. We cannot tell a nation of 60 million people, including children and the elderly, that the NHS is free at the point of delivery and then produce the wicked joke that there are no dentists.

What do I say to my constituents? The Minister knows about my concerns, because I have written to her over and over again about one person after another. I am embarrassed to represent an area in the world's fifth-largest economy and tell my constituents that they cannot have free dental health provision.

Natascha Engel: Has the hon. Gentleman discussed the matter with his PCT? What was its response about NHS provision for dentistry?

Mr. Steen: I am impressed by my PCTs, which are responsible and highly committed organisations. The snag is that they cannot find dentists. I do not know whether something is wrong with the contract. In any case, I am not concerned about the machinery, but about every person I see in the street who is in pain. I represent them, so I say to the Minister that she must do something about the contract so that people can receive free dental care. She must provide the dentists. I do not mind if she brings in busloads of Bulgarians or Romanians. She can bring them in from any country in Europe. She misunderstood my earlier question—I do not object. The Prime Minister misunderstood me too, but he regularly misunderstands my questions. The point is: what are we going to do about the situation? I cannot represent a constituency when I know that people will continue to be in pain and will have to find money that they do not have to pay for private dentistry.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): I apologise to the House as I shall have to be discourteous and leave soon after speaking. I have a ministerial meeting at 3 o'clock on a pressing constituency matter, but I shall try to return for the wind-ups so that I can hear the ministerial response.

Over the past six months, I have convened meetings of London dentists. We have held two meetings at the House of Commons, as well as meetings with individual groups of dentists elsewhere. One of the meetings in the House was in November and the other in February, and I am grateful to the Minister for the access that she gave to civil servants, who attended one of the meetings, and also for the correspondence she provided that enabled us to share information about the new contract procedures with the dentists.

Like many dentists, I welcome the Government's policies with regard to the additional resources and their commitment to dentistry. I was impressed by the parliamentary Labour party briefing and can understand why on this occasion it was circulated more widely than usual, given the additional resources it described, including the £368 million for improving dental services in July 2004, the 19 per cent. increase since 2003–04 and the nearly 1,500 new dentists. I welcome all that, but I want to raise issues about the method of introduction of the new contract, especially the timing, some of which relate to London and others specifically to my constituency.

My colleague, the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd), has pointed out that the contract is being introduced in our area at a time when Hillingdon primary care trust is struggling with a deficit of £25 million. It looks as though the amount may be nearer £30 million—it varies week by week. That has resulted in an inability to manage change generally and impedes the introduction of the new contract. We are on our third chief executive in less than four months—and counting. The PCT's struggles with its deficit have led to problems in the introduction of the contract.

I welcome the Minister's statement about the implementation group and the review mechanism, which is a real breakthrough and was one of my recommendations. However, the Department may need to intervene in some instances—such as Hillingdon and other parts of London—where there has been a failure to manage the introduction of the contract effectively. I have two brief examples of the impact on my constituency.

The first relates to the Hayes dental practice in Station road, Hayes, where Dr. Stern has encountered a problem to which the Minister referred earlier, although it was not addressed locally in the way that she described. Last year, during the reference period, two of Dr. Stern's colleagues left and he was unable to recruit for some time. As a result, the PCT's assessment of his activity and income levels was not an accurate reflection. In December, he thought that he had held a co-operative meeting with the PCT. He contacted it regularly after that but heard nothing about the contract. On Thursday 23 February, he received a package containing two copies of the new 135-page contract, with an accompanying letter that stated:

"You will be aware that you need to have signed the contract and confirmed this to us by no later than midday on Friday 24th."

So he was given only 24 hours. Furthermore, when he read the contract he discovered that it did not take into account the representations that he made about staffing and activity levels during the reference period, so his income will not be as before and he will have to lay off staff, including not only his dentist colleagues but also support staff.

I accept what the Minister said about appeal procedures, but that dentist thought that he had gone through that process during his negotiations with the PCT. The Department may have to intervene in such cases, where the PCT is clearly struggling to manage the introduction of the new contract.

The second example affects colleagues in Hillingdon and Ealing and relates to the orthodontics centre in Northolt opened by Sarinda Kumar over the past 12 months. We all welcomed the centre, to which the dentists involved committed significant personal outlay, raising capital of about £450,000. However, because the centre opened mid-year, the contract value is not sufficient to reflect the new service it provides. As far as I am aware, there has not been much response from local PCTs in terms of recognising those needs.

The orthodontics service at Hillingdon hospital has also suffered due to the PCT cuts, which relates to a general point about the priority accorded to dental services in several PCTs. There seems to be a lack of sufficient specialist advice from local dentists in the PCT and a failure to acknowledge the need to involve them fully in discussions about the roll-out of services generally and in consultations about the implementation of the contract.

Other general matters were raised that were not specific to my constituency or London overall. There is a concern that the units of dental activity do not fully reflect the importance of prevention. There may well be a need in the review process to find out whether a specific, separate UDA is necessary for prevention and dental health promotion.

Mr. Cox: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if a charge of £183 is levied for a single crown and precisely the same charge is levied for doing six crowns, the incentive for those whose teeth are becoming bad will be to wait until they are sufficiently bad to maximise the value for money that they get from the charge that they pay?

John McDonnell: Such issues may well arise during the review process, because the one thing that neither the Government nor any of us want to do is to provide any disincentive to people turning up for health treatments.

Another concern was raised by the London dentists. PCTs obviously set their own targets and the budgets are allocated and then capped. The concern is that, particularly in areas such as mine and in London, PCTs will put pressure on individual practices to increase their income to a certain level from charging. In other words, that is a perverse incentive in the system, thus undermining NHS work as well.

There are concerns about children and exempt patient contracts, which will be determined by PCTs. Given the lack of local engagement with adequate dentistry advice and support, the decision-making process on how such contracts are allocated needs to be closely reviewed by the Department in the first year of operation.

[John McDonnell]

A number of dentists have said that they must introduce new computer systems at considerable cost. The information that we received from yesterday's meeting is that those costs range from about £10,000—with one practice, it was £35,000—and that the allocation that they receive goes nowhere near recovering those costs. In fact, less than 10 per cent. is recovered in some instances and a lot less than that in many others. That will impact on the overall delivery of service.

I believe that the Government have exceptionally good intentions. There is real commitment, and it has been backed by resources. I congratulate the Minister on her personal commitment to the development of dentistry policy. We would not have come this far in the allocation and investment of resources and the priority for dentistry without her personal commitment, but those intentions are being frustrated in many constituencies, particularly mine, because of the financial crisis in the PCTs themselves.

I accept that an element of ring-fencing has gone on for three years, but the concern—it was raised by the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood—is that beyond those three years, no matter what statutory duties are placed on PCTs, dentistry will be a soft option when prioritising expenditure. The Government will need to monitor the situation closely over the next six to 12 months in particular. In special circumstances, such as mine, direct intervention by the Department may be needed if the system is seen to be failing and we are losing NHS dentists.

I welcome the implementation group review and the structure that has been announced today, but I suggest that, first, the review should report in six months and then in 12 months, and that that information comes before the House. We could then have another debate—not on an Opposition day, which sometimes degenerate into knockabout rather than real debate—on that report to find out what adjustments need to be made to the system. There is a commitment on both sides of the House: we want dentistry to improve in this country, but we want it to do so in a way that brings people with us. I do not think that dentists are convinced about the system. If we introduce the appropriate adjustments as we learn from experience, we will be able to retain people in the NHS and to work together to improve the system overall for all our constituents.

2.53 pm

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): I realise that time is marching on, so I will keep my comments as short as possible.

I empathise with the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Natascha Engel). I, too, have lost my two front teeth, although I did so by failing to obey the first rule of cricket: "Always keep your eye on the ball."

I am unsure where in this country the Government are fulfilling their pledge of access for all to an NHS dentist—perhaps in Liverpool or Doncaster, but certainly not in Milton Keynes. Indeed, in an answer to a question posed back in June by my hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner), who is not in his place, we discovered that just 62 per cent. of children and 39 per cent. of adults—an overall rate of just 45 per cent. of people—are registered with a dentist in Milton Keynes. The figure is down considerably—in fact, 10 per cent. or some 20,000 people—since 1997. That is an extraordinarily low figure. If just 45 per cent. of the population of Milton Keynes is registered with a dentist, about 122,000 people in my city are not.

Perhaps the Minister believes—I am sure that she does not—that my constituents simply do not want to register with a dentist. If so, I point her to a recent survey carried out by Milton Keynes PCT showing that 79 per cent. of people who are not registered with an NHS dentist would like to do so—a fact that is backed up by my overflowing postbag of correspondence from many constituents who have written to me on the issue. For example, my constituent, Mrs. Byrne, who wrote to me only this week, is representative of many young mothers when she says:

> "I have a 9 month old son and I am 7 months pregnant, I have been advised to go to the dentist for a check up but unfortunately cannot find one in Milton Keynes. My son's first teeth are now through and I need a dentist for him too. I am quite disgusted that I have an NHS maternity exemption certificate so that I can go to the dentist but the NHS are not providing the dentists for myself and many other people in my situation to attend."

Perhaps the Minister, who seems to suggest that training dentists is one, if not the main solution to the problem, believes that my constituents are simply not looking hard enough for a dentist. If so, perhaps she would like to meet my constituent, Mrs. Carter, who in an e-mail this week says:

> "I desperately need an NHS dentist who will accept my two children, my husband and myself as new patients and I have phoned every number on the list provided by the PCT and none of them are taking on new NHS patients. I refuse to go private as my husband and I have paid far too much in National Insurance to have to pay for it again."

That raises an interesting question about national insurance contributions to which I will return in a moment, but is it really that hard to get a dentist in Milton Keynes?

Like many people in Milton Keynes, I am not registered with a dentist. Indeed, I am tempted to ask my hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford), who is no longer in his place, whether he will start accepting NHS patients, but I sense that that would probably be unfair. I was able to find just one practice that was happy to accept new patients, but there is a catch: they must be under the age of 18 and they would qualify only if both parents were involved. However, I accept that that has been addressed.

As a Back-Bench Conservative MP who may feel that we have absolutely no influence in the House, I am delighted that my very first question in the House was to the Minister on this subject. I asked her back in June whether, effectively, she had replaced the access-for-all-to-an-NHS-dentist policy with a buy-two-get-one-free policy. So I am delighted—I am sure that the people of Milton Keynes are, too—that I seem to have had some impact on the House.

If I were a cynic, I would ask whether, in reality, the Government are pursuing their policy in the hope that people will perhaps get used to going private and therefore not want an NHS dentist, with possible effects on funding dentistry in the future. So who is to blame? I am sure the Government are keen to blame dentists, but I am afraid that I do not blame them. Having talked to my local dentists, it is clear to me that they are doing the very best that they can in extremely difficult circumstances. They do not want to turn away NHS patients, but seem to have little choice.

Dentists have serious concerns, some of which have already been raised by my hon. Friends, so I will focus on just two—first, the time scale for the new contracts. Certainly, in Milton Keynes at least, they were given their contracts just eight days ago, yet they were expected to return the first draft by yesterday. The second concern is the security of the new contracts. Although they will last for three years initially and have been ring-fenced, there appears to be little security beyond that point. For example, if an associate leaves a practice, there is absolutely no guarantee that the PCT must award a contract to the same practice. It is therefore very difficult for dentists to plan the expansion of their practices beyond the three-year period. I should be grateful to the Minister if she considered that issue.

Perhaps we should blame our local primary care trusts, but to be fair to Milton Keynes primary care trust, which is being forced to swim against the tide because of an ever-increasing population, it is at least trying to address the problem, although the early signs are that the results of its efforts are, at best, mixed. It sent out a mixture of practice and individual contracts, but 20 per cent. of dentists have so far refused to accept a contract. As of yesterday, 40 per cent. of dentists had not returned their contracts, and at least a third of the dentists who had returned and accepted their contracts had done so in dispute while waiting for further negotiations with the PCT. Those statistics are hardly encouraging. Given the rapidly growing population of Milton Keynes, Milton Keynes PCT is one of the hardest pressed primary care trusts in the country, although I am confident that it will try to do the right thing when funding dentistry in Milton Keynes.

Stephen Hammond (Wimbledon) (Con): My hon. Friend has obviously had extensive conversations with his primary care trust. Has it given him any indication of the possible implications of the 12-monthly block payments that are coming through on its funding and deficit next year?

Mr. Lancaster: My hon. Friend makes a valuable point. There is deep concern about that matter in Milton Keynes, as I am sure there is in his constituency. Although I am confident that my primary care trust, which is staffed by excellent people, will try to do the right thing, I am worried that once we get beyond the three-year ring-fenced period, there will be a temptation to divert funds for dentistry elsewhere. I hope that the Minister will ensure that that does not happen.

Finally, may I pass on a question that many of my constituents are keen that I should ask the Minister? Given that they have paid their national insurance contributions yet failed to get an NHS dentist, will she give them their money back?

Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): It is a pleasure to follow my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster), who gave us several examples of problems in his constituency that are reflected in mine. The Government's proposals on NHS dentistry are characterised by being target driven, centralised and shambolic, although perhaps we should not be surprised because that is a description of their general approach to the NHS. Several Labour Members focused their comments on the relatively high salaries of dentists, but it should be noted that Conservative Members are worried about access for patients, which should be the focus of the Government.

I want to talk especially about younger dentists because the proposals have been presented as representing a bright future for NHS dentistry. However, is that the case? I suggest that they are yet another nail in the coffin for NHS dentists, especially young dentists. I concede that funding, recruitment and the number of training places have increased, which is welcome, but how will that affect in practice young dentists who want to be part of the supposed bright future? Will my constituents get proper access to a dentist? I suggest that the contract is an obstacle to any of the relatively good progress that has been made and a road block for young dentists.

Let us consider the situation for young women dentists, especially those who are young mothers. One of my constituents, Mrs. Surabaskaran, has told me about her experiences, which are no doubt replicated throughout the country. She is an NHS dentist who graduated in dentistry in 1998 from Kings college school of medicine and dentistry and looked forward to a future in the NHS. She was on maternity leave for five months during the relevant period over which her contract value was calculated, and has been in negotiation with the PCT to get an appropriate contract value. However, her maternity leave has been wholly discounted, so she has effectively been left with a contract that would be worth half her salary. Although she has 2,000 patients on her list, there is a risk that she will be forced out of the NHS because the PCT has stonewalled by saying that it has insufficient funds to address the situation.

The Minister might well point out that the framework proposals said:

"Allowances will be made where the practice has carried a vacancy"— for example, due to maternity leave. It was suggested that allowances could be made for dentists who were

"increasing or reducing, or planning to increase or reduce the amount of NHS care they provide"

during the relevant period. However, despite all the good intentions in "Framework proposals for primary dental services in England in 2005", the reality is that a young dentist such as Mrs. Surabaskaran is being left short when negotiating her contract because the local PCT refuses to award a contract with the value that she should properly have.

As the PCT has said no to Mrs. Surabaskaran, she must use the dispute resolution procedure for the contract and go to the Secretary of State. However, where will that leave her? Will she be guaranteed a better value than that which she has been offered? Given that the contract should have been signed yesterday, she faces the precarious predicament of endangering not only her future career in the NHS, but the 2,000 patients who are on her list. Is the process for dispute resolution appropriate? Should the Secretary of State be the binding determinant of a contract? Such a procedure might be appropriate in different parts of the NHS, but should the Secretary of State make decisions about a party who is a sub-contractor risking private capital? Again, the controlling hand—the dead hand—of the Government is at the heart of the proposals. We have heard that D-day has passed, so many NHS dentists, especially young dentists, face chaos.

Steve McCabe: The hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) said a moment ago that a three-year contract was not sufficient, although these days most people would be happy with a three-year contract. However, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes) seems to be saying that the contract should have no obligations and that there should be no mechanism to resolve disputes. Is he seriously saying that we should simply pay the money and give no further attention to what happens? Does he think that that would be credible?

Mr. Burrowes: The debate is about the proposals that the Government have put in place. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that there has been discrimination against a young dentist who has been on maternity leave. She has been left with a bureaucratic and centralised resolution process. She effectively must choose between not continuing to provide NHS care, or meeting the needs of her 2,000 NHS patients.

I want the Minister to hear the words of Mrs. Surabaskaran loud and clear. She says:

"If the dispute is not resolved speedily with due consideration for my maternity leave I will be forced to seek a job in the private sector."

However, she does not wish to do that.

Ms Rosie Winterton: In the circumstances that the hon. Gentleman describes, I believe that his constituent could sign the contract with a note to say that there is a dispute about some aspects of it.

Mr. Burrowes: I am grateful to the Minister for that point, but my constituent has no guarantee that she will receive her due reward. She runs the risk of being given a contract with a value that is half what it should be. Neither she, nor any other NHS dentist, has an individual contract guarantee.

We must also consider the situation facing graduates. We have to welcome the fact that 100 extra dental school places were announced on 26 January, but is that the only way to secure the future of NHS dentistry? The Dental Practitioners Association says:

"The current NHS access problem"— the concern is not so much about salaries or training places, but NHS access—

"is caused by the large gap between the terms and conditions offered by the NHS and those in the private sector. This has led to an outflow of dentists from the NHS which has been exacerbated by the prospect of an inflexible and inefficient new NHS contract in April 2006 which is generally expected to make working in the NHS less desirable to most dentists."

That is the case, particularly for vocational dental practitioners. How do they fare with this contract? If one looks at the detail of the contract, one sees that all revenue associated with vocational training will be put on hold during the relevant period and will be removed from the contract value. The employment of vocational dental practitioners will essentially be at the behest of the primary care trust. We have heard already of deficits among PCTs, and the situation is the same in my constituency. It is fair to suggest that the first to feel the squeeze in the PCTs' capacity to deliver NHS dentistry will be vocational dental practitioners, who will be unable to find a place to pursue their training. Many a dental practice is not receiving, in its units of dental activity, any recognition of vocational dental practice. The PCTs do not have to provide that recognition. They have been asked by the Government to do so, but there is no specific requirement to take any account of the vocational route that we would wish many people to follow.

Finally, I turn to the care given to patients. It is at the heart of the motion, which refers to support for preventive work and the achievement of good oral health. The Minister says that it is all about preventive care, but what is the reality? As dentists in my constituency tell me, no real value is given to preventive treatment in the UDA system. Root canal treatment is worth three points, as is extraction. Root canal treatment usually takes three 45-minute visits, while extraction takes half an hour, so there will be an incentive to take out a tooth rather than give root canal treatment, despite their having the same UDA value of three points. Dental repairs too, will come straight out of the dentist's salary, so there will be an incentive to fit fewer crowns and more fillings. The contract looks more to points than to patients.

I should conclude because I have gone way over the time—eight minutes—that dental practitioners will be allowed by the contract for an examination, X-ray, and scale and polish. The question is not so much whether there will be time for NHS dentists to give quality care but whether there will be any access at all to NHS dentists.

3.12 pm

Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): I am grateful to Her Majesty's official Opposition for initiating this debate, the second on this subject. The first was last October and was initiated by the Liberal Democrats. We were told then by the Minister that we should wait until the new contracts had come out to see what would happen. I have to tell her that in my constituency it is no longer a case of saying that NHS dentistry is in crisis; NHS dentistry simply does not exist. In 1997, 58 per cent. of the population was registered with an NHS dentist. Last year, that figure had dropped to 35 per cent. The Minister herself admitted, when I questioned her, that that is not progress. I have asked on numerous occasions, both verbally and in writing, what she will do to improve the situation.

Since Christmas, the situation in Rochdale has got worse. Last December, residents received letters from the last remaining full-time NHS practice informing them that from 1 April this year it was pulling out of NHS dentistry completely. I asked the practitioner why, and he replied that he simply did not believe that the new contract, with its emphasis on dental units, would do anything to improve what was already a hard-pressed and desperate situation. From 1 April, there will be no full-time NHS dentist working in my constituency.

I listened very carefully to the Minister to see what the new contract could offer us. She talked about what it will mean to existing dentists, particularly with regard to the reference year. How does that create new money to enable Rochdale PCT to employ more dentists? It does nothing in that regard. The dentists have to be in the system already, receiving NHS money; no NHS money will be transferred to non-existent "ghost" dentists.

Stephen Hammond: We have heard a lot about access, which is the key point. The hon. Gentleman has described what is happening in his constituency, and that has been the tale throughout the House. One question that the Minister has to answer today is how many dentists who had previously resigned from the NHS will come back to the NHS under this contract. Surely the answer is zero, and that is a failure of access.

Paul Rowen: I agree entirely. The situation in the borough of Rochdale will get worse because dentists in the Heywood and Middleton constituency—I think that there are eight—have said that they, too, have no intention of signing the new contract. A borough that already has a very poor record of dental health will be left with virtually no NHS dentists. Yes, we have a walk-in centre, and it is fully committed, but it is doing nothing in the way of preventive work. It simply cannot cope with that on top of the emergencies that it deals with.

In the past 12 months, we have seen new dental practices open in neighbouring areas, such as Radcliffe and Bury. People in my constituency have queued from 5 o'clock in the morning to get themselves on the list at those practices. A dentist from Zimbabwe recently opened a practice in the neighbouring constituency of Oldham, East and Saddleworth, and within four days his list was full. Rochdale needs 10 dentists to treat those people who cannot afford to go to a private dentist.

When the Balderstone surgery announced that it was pulling out of the NHS, a constituent came to see me. He said that he had been told bluntly that if he wanted to stay with the practice he had to be prepared to pay £15 a month. There is no way that that gentleman could afford that sort of money. I wrote to the PCT, pointing out the situation with the last remaining NHS practice and asking what it was going to do and what advice it could give me to pass on to my constituent. The advice was laughable; it was to look at the website. When one looks at the website—not everyone has access to the web—one asks, "Where are the dentists for Rochdale?" They simply do not exist. I really am sick of hearing talk about this new contract and what it is supposed to deliver, when the few dentists left in the NHS are being driven out as a result of the obsession with targets.

We need to hear concrete proposals from the Government to address real shortages. I have been asking since May, when I was elected, what the Minister will do to deal with the crisis in my constituency. Everything that she has done so far has made the situation worse. In the next few years, we will see a dramatic rise in dental ill-health; we will see more expensive treatment having to be carried out; and we will see people's general dental health deteriorating greatly. That is not why the NHS was created. It is not what the Prime Minister promised us back in 1999, when he said that everyone who wanted an NHS dentist would have one within two years. The reality is that fewer and fewer people in my constituency have access to a dentist.

I have asked for a meeting with the Minister. I invite her to come to Rochdale and explain to people why we cannot get NHS dentists in the constituency. They deserve answers and we ought to have them now.

3.19 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I applaud the Minister's courage in coming to the Chamber for the debate, given that there is opposition on all Benches, including the Labour Benches, and opposition outside the House to the Government's proposals.

I praise the work of dentists throughout Shropshire, especially in my constituency. I praise also the professionals who work in orthodontics and dentistry at the Princess Royal hospital in my constituency. They all provide a valuable and vital health service for my constituents.

I note that the Government have tried to shift the blame from them to primary care trusts and to dentists. However, it is the Government who will be funding PCTs. Those trusts, with scarce resources, will have to apportion dental contracts accordingly. Given that Shropshire County PCT and Telford and Wrekin PCT are already struggling financially, that does not hold out much hope for my constituents with dental problems for the months ahead. That is clearly of concern to them and to me.

I remind the Minister of the Prime Minister's comments at Question Time today—that we should trust professionals. We have heard that mantra over many months. We were told in the context of the Terrorism Bill that we must trust the professionals. We were told, "The police are asking for X and we should give them X." Why is it that on this issue the Government are not prepared to listen to the professionals? Let us listen to the words of the British Dental Association. It says:

> "The Government's aims of securing patient access, improving oral health and raising the quality of patient care will not be achieved by the imposition of this target-driven NHS contract."

If the Government are serious about listening to professionals, let us see them listen to dental professionals on this point.

Mr. Martlew: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mark Pritchard: If the hon. Gentleman's intervention is brief, I shall certainly give way.

Mr. Martlew: I shall be extremely brief. The hon. Gentleman says that we should listen to professionals, and I accept that. Did he vote against part of the Terrorism Bill?

Mark Pritchard: I am tempted to go down that route. I know that Labour Members do not want us to address serious issues on dental care. That being so, I shall stick to the substantive points that other Members have raised. I shall be happy to discuss the point that the hon. Gentleman has raised outside the Chamber at a later stage, at his cost, over a cup of tea.

[Mark Pritchard]

It has been said that it is the poor who will suffer, and that is absolutely right; and that the elderly will suffer as a result of the proposed changes, and that is absolutely right. In addition, everyday families and single people—in fact, everybody—are likely to suffer in the light of the proposed changes.

The Minister has reminded us of the number of dentists entering or opting in to NHS contracts. The overall net figure, including those who have opted out of NHS contracts over the past few months, or who are likely to do so, shows that there will be a drain away from the NHS. There will be fewer dentists providing NHS treatment. I accept that some centres have opened, and I know that in the neighbouring constituency to mine—Telford—there will be a new centre, but that will not meet the needs of all the constituents in Shropshire. The demand will not be met. Unfortunately, there is a net loss overall.

Martin Horwood (Cheltenham) (LD): I wish to reinforce the point that the hon. Gentleman has just made. When I spoke to my primary care trust last year, it was putting various measures in place—no doubt applauded by the Minister—and hoped to achieve 21,000 new NHS registrations. When I met the members of the trust only a week ago, they told me that they were expecting 14,000 fewer registrations because of the likely impact of the new contract. This is NHS dentistry in crisis.

Mark Pritchard: Absolutely; crisis is an appropriate word. We have a crisis in health care generally, and it is not the fault of the professionals who are working in our hospitals, our dental practices and our primary care sector. On so many of these issues, the fault lies with the Government. We have seen today Ministers smiling and taking these issues lightly, no doubt with extremely healthy teeth. They should take these issues far more seriously and look after my constituents who are unable to access NHS dentists.

The Minister might be aware—I have discussed this previously with her—that the nearest dentist for some of my constituents in, for example, the wonderful market town of Shifnal, is as far away as Lichfield. It is totally unacceptable that young mothers, often having to use public transport, have to change two or three times to access the NHS. As my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) rightly said, given that people have paid their taxes, the very least that they might expect is the standard of NHS dental care that they enjoyed over many years. There has been criticism of past Conservative Governments, but at least people could register under the previous Conservative Government with an NHS dentist. People will not be able to do so given the present proposals.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mark Pritchard: I recognise that my colleague is a distinguished Member on health matters. Unfortunately, one other Member wishes to speak in the debate. That being so, I shall give way on another occasion, perhaps.

Many orthodontists in my constituency have concerns. We are likely to lose an orthodontist place at the Princess Royal hospital, which will result in people waiting even longer to receive orthodontic treatment. Orthodontics should not be an aside to general dental services. There are 550 patients who access orthodontic care at the Princess Royal hospital. They will be unable to access future care if we do not replace the orthodontic practitioner that we have lost over recent weeks. That will lead to a decrease in oral health. As I said earlier in an intervention, I think that in the long term we shall see an increase in gingivitis. Sadly, we may even see an increase in cancers of the mouth that are not picked up by dentists and orthodontists.

In conclusion—I am rushing through to try to be helpful to other Members—the Minister said that the Government would review dental and orthodontic contracts once they had been in place for some months. I ask the Minister for that review prior to the introduction of the contracts. If she is to consult the professionals then, why does not she listen to their advice now? Surely that is a logical position to take.

My constituents are being disfranchised as a result of the Government's policy. They are likely to be more disfranchised from access to NHS dentists as a result of the policies in the new dental contracts. This flies in the face of the Prime Minister's saying in September that all people will have access to an NHS dentist within two years. Clearly, we and my constituents have yet again been misled by the Prime Minister on a key health issue.

Mr. Stephen Crabb (Preseli Pembrokeshire) (Con): I shall be brief. We have had an interesting debate, and many hon. Members have made my points for me.

I shall draw on the Welsh experience, not just because it is St. David's day, but because many of the things that we have experienced in Wales are now being experienced in England. What has happened in my constituency offers a glimpse of what Members representing English constituencies will face. Pembrokeshire has the lowest rate of adult access to NHS dentistry in England and Wales. Just 15 per cent. of adults are registered with an NHS dentist, and 85 per cent. do not have access to NHS dentistry, which has all but collapsed in west Wales. One by one, dentists have exited the NHS, so their patients have had to sign up to private schemes.

In the past two years, the Pembrokeshire local health board, which is responsible for commissioning, has made great efforts to tackle the problem, to the extent that it has employed dentists directly, but it has fought against the tide. I do not wish to be partisan, but it should be placed on the record that all of this has happened on Labour's watch. What would have happened if the people of Pembrokeshire had been told in 1997 that within eight years they would witness the almost wholesale destruction of NHS dental services?

Martin Horwood: It is a little disingenuous of the hon. Gentleman to say that all of this has happened on Labour's watch, because the peak in NHS dentistry registration occurred in 1992. It started to fall because of the new contract introduced by the last Conservative Government.

Mr. Crabb: My memory may fail me, but I do not recall people queuing from 5 o'clock in the morning to sign up with a dentist under a Conservative Government. The truth is that NHS dentistry has all but collapsed in parts of the country under the present Government. Labour Members ought to be extremely concerned about the trends in my constituency developing in constituencies that they represent. My constituency had a Labour majority of 9,000 at the end of the 1990s, but as NHS dentistry unravelled so did that majority.

Few issues galvanise so many people from so many different backgrounds as the NHS. The Labour party should understand that better than anyone, as it claims to be the party of the NHS. The NHS serves everyone, and people are attached to it, so they are rightly angry when they wake up one day and find that their NHS dental service, for which they helped to pay, no longer exists and they are required to sign up for a private sector service.

In conclusion, the new contract represents a massive missed opportunity to reinvigorate NHS dentistry. Not one dentist to whom I have spoken in Wales or England believes that the clock can be turned back, and they are very pessimistic indeed about the future of NHS dentistry in this country. The truth is that the NHS dental service is dying under the Labour Government.

3.31 pm

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): We have had an instructive debate this afternoon, with a total of 11 Back-Bench speeches, all of high quality. I have received reams of correspondence from dentists about the new contract—none of it is complimentary. Ministers will be particularly interested in messages I have received from Leicester, Doncaster, Liverpool and Birmingham. Most of them use parliamentary language, but some do not. I should like to begin by sharing one that I have just received from Doncaster, as I know that the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton) will be interested in it:

"As of 1020 hours Doncaster time, we have not received a contract . . . I can state with a fair degree of confidence 100 per cent. of dentists in Doncaster have not agreed to the new contract."

The Minister made great play of apparent demands from patients for a simplified, more transparent charging mechanism, but I can honestly say that I have not met a single constituent who is exercised about the complexities of the charging system. However, like my hon. Friends the Members for Totnes (Mr. Steen), for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) and for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard), as well as the hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen), I have received shedloads of letters about deteriorating access to NHS dentistry. That is not surprising, because in the strategic health authority area serving my constituents only 25 per cent. of people are registered with an NHS dentist. I am horrified to hear that in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Preseli Pembrokeshire (Mr. Crabb) the figure is even lower at 15 per cent.

As constituency MPs, we know—and Citizens Advice recently confirmed it—that access to NHS dentistry is of overwhelming concern to dental patients, despite the Prime Minister's famous pledge in 1991, which, I note, is not reiterated in the Government amendment to our motion. The contract is set to make matters much worse. Community Dental Centres is a group of nine major dental practices in the west country that cares for 100,000 patients. It announced yesterday that unless there are changes to the contract it is likely to pull out of NHS dentistry. It points out, as did the London local dental committees that I met last night with the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Hurd), that payments will be based on dental activity, which is not the same as dental care. Activity implies the treadmill, which is precisely what we thought Ministers were keen to remove. Dentists want to offer care to patients, not activity, and the Minister ought to know the difference between the two.

The consumer organisation, Which?, and the National Audit Office appear united in their belief that primary care trusts are simply not up to managing the new contract. Which? has asked for a clear audit framework to measure the impact of the changes. That would at least allow us to draw breath and reconsider after a few months or a year. I am pleased to hear that the Minister is going to put in place a review group and implementation team. I hope that it meets in six months' time and in 12 months' time and that at each of those points, as the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington suggested, there is a report that is debated in this place.

What is the Minister doing about contractual arrangements for practices that have grown in the test year? Yesterday, I met a full-time NHS dentist from south-west London who is preparing to sack three members of staff on 1 April because his practice growth has outstripped his allocation of units of dental activity. That problem, which was well described by my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes), is particularly severe for young orthodontic practices, because they are paid eighteen months in arrears. An orthodontist from Bristol wrote to the Minister, with a helpful copy to me, to say:

"The financial disaster we are facing is due to the methodology adopted by the Department of Health for deriving contract values for orthodontic practices."

On the same theme, a Birmingham dentist writes:

"One Dentist in South Birmingham extended his practice to 6 Dentists last year from 3 to accommodate the extra patients seeking NHS treatment, he has been told his budget is such that the 6 dentists must work part time or 3 must leave, as his funding is based on the period when he had 3 dentists. This will leave about 4000 patients without a Dentist."

Clearly, at this late stage there is considerable confusion about how the anomalies that the test year will introduce are to be resolved. This is the eleventh hour.

I am assuming that moneys released from the many dentists who opt out will be reallocated to the few who are expanding their services or to the Government's massively expensive dental access centres. However, practices willing to expand have not been told that that is the case. Can the Minister offer us a time scale? Why are we getting reports that the few high street dentists still willing to take NHS patients are being turned down if there is a dental access centre nearby, despite the big cost disparity? I suspect that it is because dental access centres are a Government pet project that must be supported at all costs.

[Dr. Andrew Murrison]

More concerns emerge from Birmingham on the subject of out-of-hours cover. It appears that the contract, taken with PCT deficits, will mean that post-1 April cover will be basic, to say the least. Birmingham dentists have been told that haemorrhage and swelling that compromises the airway are the only items to be regarded as dental emergencies, which means that dental pain is not. Dental pain is the most common form of dental emergency, and for those of us who have suffered it in the middle of the night it truly is an emergency. Are we really to have a contract that will allow people in this country, in the 21st century, to struggle through the night with acute dental pain?

I have had a raft of messages from dentists over the past six weeks or so. I will read just a few of them. They would fill two box files and, sadly, time does not permit me to read them all. A dentist from Coventry writes to me with more than a hint of desperation:

"Three of my best friends with over 80 years of NHS experience between them have sent out their conversion letters."

That is, conversion to private practice. He continues:

"These are dentists who have stuck with the system until now. There are many hanging on there by their finger tips hoping this disaster will be stopped on Wednesday. They are torn because of feeling for their patients."

He signs off,

"Best of luck on Wednesday."

A dentist from Yorkshire says, typically more briefly:

"if these reforms come in I doubt there will be an NHS dental service worthy of the name in 3 years."

A general dental practitioner from Colchester writes:

"We will reduce our NHS commitment. Accordingly, letters will go out to my NHS kids/exempts shortly, and my associate will keep what little NHS funding remains, prior to a move to private practice within 12 months. It's the only solution that I can come up with that allows me to keep people in a job. The alternative is to make everybody redundant!"

That raises an important point because, in Committee, the Minister said that primary care trusts could provide children-only contracts. However, since children and exempt adults do not pay the 80 per cent. contribution, how will PCTs that operate with massive deficits manage to provide such targeted contracts? The contracts that they let will depend heavily on the 80 per cent. co-payment.

The contract is clearly too rigid. The British Dental Association rightly believes that dentists will overdo their UDAs for safety, yet there is no way to claim for them. If they undershoot, they will face penalties. Despite the assurances in Committee, the contracts that have emerged appear to allow for the tailing off of services towards the end of a year and for some jockeying to approximate as closely as possible the target number of UDAs. There is a parallel in the way in which PCTs finesse hospital treatment when funds run out at the end of the financial year. That is no way to manage patients.

Ministers claim that the new contract will encourage a more preventive, health-promotion focus. How will that happen when the cost of the band 1 episode on which Ministers rely for health promotion will be at least twice the current cost? Nothing in the contract rewards the use of dental hygienists, whose services may become the preserve of private patients. I am sure that that was not the Minister's intention last year when she opened the school for complementary professions to dentistry in Portsmouth, which I had the pleasure of visiting last week.

Several dentists have written about the perversities that the Government's interpretation of the Cayton report introduced. Earlier, we heard the Minister's explanation of the difference between the Cayton report and what we are now offered, and the extraordinary 40 per cent. uplift. Perhaps the Under-Secretary will expand on precisely what the Minister meant in her justification of the difference.

We know that the cost of a basic filling will increase substantially and that a mouthful of fillings will cost the same as one. Clearly, the articulate and well-briefed patient will be able to obtain several items at once from band 2 while those who are less adept at using the system may lose out. There will be a tendency for dentists to offer simpler and quicker treatments in band 2 and only the guileful patient will be capable of pushing for more. Inevitably, that will widen oral health inequalities.

Doubtless the Government will continue to blame previous Governments, local health care managers and practically anyone else they can think of for the chaos over which they preside. An insightful dentist wrote to me earlier this year. He said:

"I believe you are after information about how the government are making a complete shambles of this new NHS dental contract.'!

That is quite right. The writer continues:

"What tickles me is, after 7 years, they are still trying to blame the previous Tory government. That's a bit like blaming potholes in the roads on the Romans."

The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) might like to note that point.

Mr. Martlew: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Murrison: Oh good gracious me. Yes, I will.

Mr. Martlew: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not get too excited. Will he admit that closing two dental schools was a mistake by the previous Conservative Government?

Dr. Murrison: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman rose to that cue. Does he seriously suggest that a decision that the university grants committee made 19 years ago is germane to the argument today? I do not think so—let us knock that one on the head. The debate is not only about the number of dentists—the hon. Gentleman knows that full well—but about how they are employed. The contract will make the position substantially worse and that is the reason for the debate.

The catalogue of disillusion and dissatisfaction continues. A husband and wife dental team in the midlands wrote:

"We are now . . . having to accept a contract that has not been fully piloted in its present form contrary to what the DOH keeps indicating. I could go into details but suffice to say I have never met so many colleagues that are disenchanted with the proposed contract and are considering cutting back or leaving the NHS in all the years since qualifying."

There is more foreboding—I could go on and on, but time is short and I hope that the Under-Secretary will have something useful to say in a few moments.

The accounts that we are receiving suggest that many dentists will sign up at the last minute as a stop-gap to allow them time to make plans, which will probably involve leaving the service. Concern about the systematic miscalculation of UDAs is a recurring theme of the correspondence that I received. The perception that the proposals will establish a new treadmill is one of the principal causes of dissatisfaction among NHS dentists. Sadly, that could have been ironed out if the new arrangements had been adequately piloted.

In my five years as a Member of Parliament, I have never received so much correspondence or attended so many meetings about a single issue. One has to be pretty dedicated to the service to be an NHS dentist, given the attractions of more lucrative private work, yet the Government appear to have alienated them all. That is quite an achievement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): This has been a rich debate, and if a single theme has emerged from it, it is that there is a need for reform. So this debate, on the eve of the most significant reforms to dental services in the history of the NHS, is indeed timely.

Important progress has been made in the provision of NHS dentistry since 1997. For example, there has been a 22 per cent. increase in the number of dentists in the system since then, from just over 16,000 in 1997 to about 20,000 in 2005. That is good news, but it is obviously not enough because many of them will not be working full-time in the NHS. Many of them will extend their private sector commitments rather than their NHS commitments, so we must take registrations into account as well. The number of registrations has gone up by 305,000 since 1998; it has increased in four of the six years for which we have records. The number of dental interventions has also gone up.

Martin Horwood: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byrne: I need to respond to many valuable points, so I will not give way at the moment. If I have time nearer 4 o'clock, I will of course give way then.

None of the increases that I mentioned has happened by accident. They have occurred because investment in NHS dentistry has risen substantially over the past few years. Indeed, it has gone up by 20 per cent., or £250 million, in the past couple of years. The Government have also recognised, however, that there are parts of the country in which an enormous amount more needs to be done. We therefore commissioned a report into the viability of the future work force, which in turn prompted our announcement of unprecedented investment.

We have heard today that there is still an enormous amount to do, and the Minister of State set out a programme of reform that rests on three foundations. The first involves a new role for local health professionals working in primary care trusts to take a lead in commissioning services, and new arrangements to ensure that, when dentists leave the NHS, the money is recycled back into the NHS. From April this year, those health professionals will have the freedom to run budgets of about £1.7 billion. The second involves the big increase in the number of dentists being trained and recruited. The third is that we are seeking to change the relationship between the NHS and dentists with a new contract that will end the treadmill and encourage prevention. It will also encourage more dentists up and down the country to serve the NHS.

The hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) spoke with great insight and intelligence, as he always does on these matters, and I welcome his congratulations on some of the proposals that my hon. Friend set out. He said that the present system was not a treadmill. That was the opinion of one of his friends, but I think that the hon. Gentleman secretly believes that it is a treadmill. We must ask ourselves whether it is unreasonable for the NHS to agree to a certain amount of activity in return for writing cheques for £80,000 a year. Looking at the national picture, we shall be writing cheques for £2.3 billion worth of dental services, and it is not unreasonable to ask for a few specifics in return.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of important questions about whether there would be monthly targets and whether the PCT would be breathing down his friend's neck. There will not be monthly targets, and it is important to remember that the contract has been set in such a way as to ensure that dentists undertake 5 per cent. less work. It therefore represents a decisive move against the treadmill. We would, however, like to know the name of the hon. Gentleman's socialist dentist friend. Given what is happening, it will be important to ensure that his party membership is being paid by direct debit.

The hon. Gentleman underlined the importance of the monitoring group that my hon. Friend the Minister of State announced, and I welcome his congratulations on that move. More broadly, NHS dentists, no matter who is in their chair, have to offer what is clinically necessary.

The hon. Member for Totnes (Mr. Steen), who is not in his place, is an excellent advert for the hon. Member for Mole Valley. The hon. Member for Totnes did not say whether the treatment he received from his colleague was on the NHS, but in a thoroughly reasonable speech he highlighted concerns that underline the need for the reforms we are making—more investment, more recruitment and putting more people in training.

The hon. Gentleman called for free care, but NHS care has not been completely free for some years, not even in Devon. The important point for him to pick up in Hansard is that the budget for NHS services next year will be ring-fenced. I think his PCT is Torbay, where there is a ring-fenced budget of £6.3 million for commissioning dental services next year.

The hon. Member for North-East Milton Keynes (Mr. Lancaster) underlined the need for more dentists, which is an argument on which we would agree, but he should do more to challenge dentists locally who are refusing to register children. He questioned the number who might sign up to their contract by the end of the month. We shall see, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State said.

We expect the vast majority of dentists to sign the new contract, and the point I would make to the hon. Gentleman about contract length is that contracts are a two-way deal. Many dentists do not want a contract of more than three years. Of course, the new general dental services contracts are an open-ended commitment, but the work that local health professionals will be doing in his area will be made substantially easier by the £8.2 million they will have to commission dental services next year.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State was able helpfully to highlight a number of aspects of the contract, in particular the issue of the abnormal reference year, which was referred to by the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Burrowes). He mentioned the example of a dentist who had taken maternity leave. She must take up the dispute resolution procedure with her PCT; it is important that she do so.

I hope the hon. Gentleman accepts that it is not possible for my hon. Friend, formidable though she is, to negotiate every single contract personally. That is why she has to set a framework and rely to some extent on local professionals to operate within it. I should also say, if it is helpful to the hon. Gentleman, that my hon. Friend can sign and earmark the disputed clauses for later resolution.

The hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) made a number of points about listening to professionals. That is an important aspect that was highlighted in a document published yesterday, to which I shall refer in a moment, but, far from dentists not being listened to, the new system is virtually identical to that developed with the BDA two years ago. Far from blaming PCTs, we are putting more power in the hands of local professionals to negotiate local arrangements. What is more, they are doing a good job.

In the hon. Gentleman's area, my hon. Friend tells me, there are new dentists arriving. He mentioned the centre that is opening just across the constituency border, where about 40,000 registrations will be available. That is part, I am glad to say, of a national pattern, and about 1,100 new dentists were recruited between April 2004 and April 2005.

The hon. Gentleman made an interesting point. If I might be permitted a detour through the registration statistics under the last Conservative Government, he said that he is proud of that record, but I remind him that in the last four years under that Government registrations fell by 2.1 million.

The hon. Member for Rochdale (Paul Rowen) highlighted the shortage of local dentists in his constituency—an issue that I think has been acknowledged. He made a number of points about the contract, the number of dentists in training and PCT responsibilities, all of which are incredibly important in taking things forward in his constituency. Rochdale's PCT has not one, but 20 NHS contracts and £4.3 million to commission services next year. He also criticised targets, but when we are writing cheques to a dentist for £80,000 it is not unreasonable to ask for a few things in return.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) spoke with great experience of health services. Usefully, he reminded us about our inheritance. He also reminded us helpfully of the struggles of living on £80,000. I extend my congratulations to his PCT, which is doing a good job locally. The fact that he has eight new dentists and 20,000 new registrations locally shows that progress is beginning to be seen in many parts of the country.

My hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Natascha Engel) echoed the point about the need for reform and the lack of constructive criticism this afternoon. She was right to highlight the problems of shopping with toddlers, especially as one gets closer to the checkout. I have three children under the age of five, and I find that the only secure way of getting through a checkout is to put them in the trolley, where their little hands cannot reach through the bars. She made the important point that the reforms that we have introduced dovetail with a broader public health strategy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (John McDonnell), who, I am glad to see, has returned to his place, raised a number of important issues in an intelligent and thought-provoking speech. Where PCTs are wrestling with important issues, it will be of some comfort to know that money is ring-fenced for dentistry. He also raised the issue of the abnormal reference year. His PCT has the flexibility to discuss that in review with local dentists. As my hon. Friend the Minister of State said in reply to some interventions, dentists can sign contracts but mark disputed terms, which can be resolved later in dispute resolution. He was right to underline the importance of the implementation group—

John McDonnell: It would be exceptionally helpful to the London dentists who have been meeting regularly if the Minister would consider a meeting with them to raise some of those general concerns.

Mr. Byrne: I will pass that request on to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, and I am sure that she would be delighted to meet London dentists.

The hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Julia Goldsworthy) made a number of useful criticisms, although we did not hear much in the way of substance or constructive alternatives. I know that the ballot for the leadership of her party is taking place shortly, and I put on record my best wishes to all those candidates who remain in the field. I hope that whoever triumphs—if that is the word I am looking for—moves rapidly to fill in the blank sheet that he has been bequeathed.

I suppose that I was looking for a slightly more forensic analysis from the hon. Lady. I know from the Electoral Commission's quarterly returns that the largest single donor to the Liberal Democrats in one quarter of last year was a company called Alpha Healthcare, so no doubt any future leader will be able to draw on a body of valuable expertise. She mentioned Birmingham, which I must mention as it is my home town. I got in touch with the Birmingham Mail yesterday, and in my experience it is right about most things. In the survey that it conducted of 175 dentists, between three and five dentists had definitively rejected the new contract—about 3.5 per cent. according to my maths. I look forward to progress over the rest of the month.

The hon. Lady also spoke about dentists being insufficiently remunerated. Again, I do not think that £80,000 is bad.

Martin Horwood: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Byrne: I will plough on, because I must finish my response.

I was slightly concerned that many of the concerns of the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne were riddled with misapprehension, not just about NICE guidance but about charging bands.

That lack of substance was not echoed by the Conservative party, however, which has been producing many interesting press releases, speeches and pamphlets. I have one here, which has on it an excellent picture of the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) looking thoughtful. It is called "Built to Last", which is a phrase that might acquire some interest. It was published yesterday, and set out some important principles. Principle four was that public services for everyone must be guaranteed by the state—hear, hear. Principle one, however, was that the proceeds of growth will be shared between public services and low taxes. It will be interesting to see how the tension between those two points is played out.

I will not dwell on the fact that it was the Conservative party that cut fees by 7 per cent., or on the fact that registrations under it fell by 2.1 million. We have already heard about the closure of two dental schools, but I think it important to note the analysis behind that decision. At the time, the then Secretary of State for Health said that there would be a possible serious oversupply of dentists in the future unless the present rate of students admitted was reduced. Given that analytical foresight, I am not sure that "built to last" is the right phrase.

While we are cutting the work load, the Conservatives would cut wages. While we are opening dental schools, they would close the doors. I commend the amendment to the House.

Question put, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

The House divided: Ayes 222, Noes 287.

Question accordingly negatived.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's Oral Health Plan for England, which builds on major oral health improvements in the last 30 years, and the additional £368 million for improving dental services in England announced in July 2004; recognises the Government's substantial achievements in improving the short and longer term supply of dentists for the NHS including recruiting the equivalent of an extra 1,459 whole-time dentists between April 2004 and October 2005, compared to the 1,000 extra dentists promised, and funding an additional 170 training places; further recognises that the Government is investing £80 million in improving dental school facilities, and has approved the establishment of a new dental school in the South West Peninsula; notes that the total number of primary care dentists in the NHS had increased to more than 21,000 by the end of October 2005, compared with 16,700 in 1997; further welcomes the reduction in the maximum patient charge from £384 to £189 from 1st April; further welcomes the new ways of working tested through Personal Dental Services pilots; supports the framework for new dental contracts which will free up significantly more time to provide preventative care, remove the requirement for NHS dentists to treat patients on a fee for service basis and ensure that a committed NHS dentist can expect to earn on average around £80,000 a year; and further welcomes the fact that, where dentists do not take up new contracts, primary care trusts will commission replacement services from other dentists.

Cancer Services

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): We now come to the second debate on an Opposition motion. I must inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister, and once again placed a 10-minute limit on speeches by Back-Bench Members.

4.15 pm

Mr. John Baron (Billericay) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House recognises that there have been improvements in the provision of cancer care due to the extra investment in the NHS and the hard work and dedication of NHS staff; but notes that a different approach is now needed to raise standards of treatment throughout the entire patient pathway to the best levels achieved in other European countries; believes that more should be done to end the postcode lottery in drugs and treatments; wishes to see more done to raise awareness of the risk factors and symptoms of cancer; further believes that cancer is increasingly a long-term condition and that there should now be a greater recognition of the importance of quality of life issues; and calls on the Government to give the National Institute of Health and Clinical Excellence a much stronger role in establishing holistic standards and entitlements to care covering the entire patient pathway.

No one can doubt the significance of cancer to many millions of people in this country. The disease remains one of the biggest killers in the UK, accounting for approximately a quarter of all deaths and claiming more than 150,000 lives a year. More than one person in three will be diagnosed with cancer at some point in their lives, and there is likely to be a significant increase in the number of new cases over the next few years, partly due to our ageing population structure.

Given its importance, I hope that this debate about the future of cancer services can be constructive. I, for one, recognise that improvements have taken place under this Government, but I shall also highlight the fact that there are still failings in the system, in the hope that they will be recognised and put right.

The Government's amendment runs the risk of appearing somewhat complacent. It is full of self-congratulation, and mainly looks back at the past. Putting that to one side, however, I accept that it would be churlish not to accept that the Government have made extra funding available and that improvements have been made. It is not often that a shadow Minister quotes good figures on the Government's behalf, but one example of those improvements is that, whereas only 42 per cent. of patients diagnosed with colon cancer in the first half of the 1990s survived for five years, that figure had risen to 50 per cent. by the start of the present decade.

Naturally, Opposition Members congratulate staff in the NHS and the voluntary sector on their hard work and dedication to patient care, which have helped to bring about the improvements in outcomes. Those improvements are welcome, but they are not exceptional when compared with the long-term trends that date back to the 1980s.

Dr. Howard Stoate (Dartford) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Baron: I intend to make some progress, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that I will give way in a little while.

[Mr. Baron]

According to figures produced by Cancer Research UK, mortality rates fell by 11 per cent. between 1988 and 1997, and by 6.5 per cent. in the first six years after Labour came to power. I hope that the Secretary of State will not copy the Prime Minister's trick of using the mortality figures since 1997 as proof of the effectiveness of the Government's cancer strategies. There has been no marked improvement in the overall trend going back to the 1980s, despite the extra funding.

The Government use more selective figures in their amendment, but even they cannot disprove our case. Although there has been a 14 per cent. fall in mortality figures since 1996, the total death rate for people under 75 years of age also fell by 14 per cent. in the final nine years of the previous Conservative Administration.

The Opposition recognise that there have been improvements in outcomes, but they have not outstripped comparable improvements in continental survival rates. According to last year's report from the Karolinska institute, the UK still lags behind other European countries when it comes to survival rates over periods of one year and five years. In fact, Britain has one of the worst survival rates in all of western Europe: whereas 81 per cent. of cancer patients in France survive for one year, the equivalent UK figure is only 67 per cent. Even Albania and Lithuania have better one-year and five-year survival rates than we do. Estimates suggest that more than 20,000 lives a year could be saved each year if the NHS met the best European standards of care.

Meanwhile, the outcomes gap between rich and poor people in the UK is also unacceptable and getting wider. A recent report from the Public Accounts Committee highlighted persistent and unacceptable variations in outcomes, depending on where patients lived. Breast cancer death rates are 20 per cent. higher in some northern regions than they are in other areas, mainly in the south of the country.

Those are unfortunate facts, but whether cancer services are equipped to meet the fresh challenges that we face is also open to question. For example, more cancer patients are now living longer, which means that, increasingly, the disease must be regarded as a long-term condition. The emphasis of policy in the future must shift from getting patients into the early stages of treatment as quickly as possible, important though that is, to ensuring that later stages of care, information and emotional support are widely available. To achieve that, several failings need to be addressed.

Dr. Stoate: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for acknowledging that services are improving. Does he agree that the most difficult time for any patient with a possible cancer diagnosis is the early stages of waiting for a diagnosis? Will he therefore join me in congratulating the NHS on reaching the target of ensuring that almost every patient whom a GP suspects may have cancer is seen within two weeks by an NHS specialist? The initial tests can be done quickly to reduce the awful burden of anxiety faced by someone in that position.

Mr. Baron: I take the hon. Gentleman's point, but he refers to early referrals. The problem is that far too many women are diagnosed with cancer after being referred on a routine, non-urgent basis. It could be argued that the two-week target has distorted clinical priorities. Breakthrough Breast Cancer has made that case many times.

Mrs. Iris Robinson (Strangford) (DUP): My mother was diagnosed with breast cancer and had a mastectomy, and I had quite a scare last September. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Government must take steps to ensure the correct analysis of mammograms? Radiographers have got that wrong in the past, but patients need to be assured that they receive the correct results. Does he also agree that herceptin should be given to the women who need it, and that we should not have a postcode lottery?

Mr. Baron: I completely agree with the hon. Lady and I will come to those points later in my speech.

Mr. Sadiq Khan (Tooting) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman compared the UK with European countries with better success rates, but does he agree that we have seen improvements over the past eight years? In 1997, Labour was the first major political party to mention the word "cancer" in a manifesto. In 1997, we had a Green Paper that set a target on death rates for 13 years' time and, in 1999, for the first time, a directorate was set up to deal with cancer. Again for the first time, in 2000, we had a 10-year plan to fight cancer. Is it not the decades of neglect that have led to the problems that the hon. Gentleman mentions?

Mr. Baron: I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that there is no point just talking about cancer—we want action, and we are trying to look forward in this debate. As I said earlier, there have been no marked improvements in mortality rates, despite all the money that has gone into the NHS. The Government can produce as many papers as they like, but what we need are improvements on the ground.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): My hon. Friend is right to talk about the need for action. Does he agree that long-term survival rates could be greatly improved if everybody had proper access to the most appropriate and up-to-date medicines, without postcode prescribing? For instance, for high grade malignant brain tumours, we need to ensure that sufferers have access to temozolomide and gliadel implants.

Mr. Baron: I agree with my hon. Friend and I shall address the issue of the postcode lottery shortly.

One reason why the Government's additional funding for cancer services has not produced a marked improvement in the longer term mortality trend is that the two-week and one-month targets, to which the hon. Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate) referred, have focused attention and resources on the front end of the patient pathway, to the detriment of the other end. The later stages of cancer care have been neglected as a result. The Government's targets may have been successful in getting more people into the system more quickly, but staff shortages have created bottlenecks further down the line. Radiotherapy offers an example.

The importance of radiotherapy is that more than half of all cancer patients will undergo it at some stage of their treatment, yet in January a report in the British Medical Journal observed that pressures on cancer units across the UK have led to longer waits for radiotherapy patients and may be reducing chances of survival.

High staff vacancy rates are causing real concern. In evidence to the pay review body, the Society of Radiographers noted that vacancy rates for therapeutic radiographers in England stood at 17 per cent. There is a particular shortfall of experienced, specialist radiographers. The Government may have increased student numbers, but new graduates do not possess the skills needed to fill that type of vacancy. According to the society, the current high number of vacancies and Government targets have made managers reluctant to release existing staff for further training opportunities, so it does not look as though the situation is getting better. As a result, waiting times for radiotherapy have lengthened since 1997. According to figures collected by the Royal College of Radiologists, radiotherapy waiting times in 2005 were worse than those documented in 1998; for example, whereas in 1998, 32 per cent. of patients in need of radical radiotherapy waited longer than the recommended maximum of four weeks, by 2005 the figure had grown to 53 per cent. More than half of all patients receiving curative radiotherapy now wait longer than the recommended maximum of four weeks.

For their part, despite a recent assurance at Health questions that hidden waits would be measured, the Government have insisted that no official monitoring of radiotherapy waiting times will take place. That is a great shame. I put it to the Secretary of State: how can the Government hope to resolve the serious problems in radiotherapy if they have no official idea of the extent of the problems because they are unwilling to collect the statistics? Although I wrote to the Secretary of State about the issue after our exchange at Health questions in January, I am still waiting for a response.

Radiotherapy is not alone, however. There are similar problems for other treatments. According to the Dr. Foster organisation, there has actually been an upward trend in waiting times for surgery for the 10 most prevalent cancers since 2001. Meanwhile, according to research cited in a report by the cancer capacity coalition, a number of clinical directors expected rising demand for chemotherapy to lead to longer waiting times over the next five years.

Things must change. The Opposition believe that one solution to the problems would be to move away from targets, which distort clinical priorities by focusing resources on the front end of the patient pathway, and to instruct NICE to draw up standards and entitlements for patients covering the entire pathway—a point to which my hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Bob Spink) referred. In other words, we should shift entirely the emphasis for cancer care from politicians dictating targets for patients to patients having entitlements to standards of care decided by medical professionals; the entire journey should be covered, including the later stages of treatment such as radiotherapy. Such an approach directly recognises the fact that there is no use in getting more people on to the patient pathway sooner if we do not ensure their access to all stages of life-saving treatment.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): Does my hon. Friend accept that an important component of radiotherapy is being able to access the service? It is recognised by authorities that stress and concern about travel arrangements affects people's ability to benefit from radiotherapy. Will he congratulate the Isle of Wight council on announcing that it is making £50,000 available from its budget this year to fill the shortfall caused by the NHS withdrawing funding for radiotherapy patients to cross the Solent for treatment in Southampton?

Mr. Baron: I do not know the details but it sounds as though the local authority has done a good job and I duly congratulate it.

David Tredinnick (Bosworth) (Con): My hon. Friend mentioned that survival rates are low. Is not one of the weaknesses of the Government's strategy that not enough has been done to support cancer sufferers? Not enough attention has been paid to the work of the Bristol Cancer Help Centre or the cancer lifeline kits that are available, which offer a range of supporting therapies and address things such as diet, detoxification, relationships at home and even spiritual issues. The Government have missed those soft targets.

Mr. Baron: My hon. Friend will remember that I attended one of his meetings on this issue, and I agree that we need to consider providing much wider support—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but when he turns away to address his hon. Friend, he should bear in mind that he should be addressing the Chair and that it is also important that he should address the microphones, otherwise, it creates a problem for Hansard.

Mr. Baron: I appreciate that guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The short answer is that I agree, but I shall make some progress.

Let me turn to access to drugs—another area where cancer services should be doing much better. We have the best cancer research record in Europe but among the poorest uptake of new drugs, as recently confirmed by the Karolinska report, which identified that the UK was consistently below average in adopting new drugs for the treatment of breast cancer, colorectal cancer and lung cancer. The reasons for that are varied. First, the NICE process has been too slow. Delays have meant that English patients have been forced to wait for approval, even though patients in Scotland and the rest of Europe have sometimes received their drugs more quickly.

Last year, CancerBACUP identified 23 cancer drugs that were subject to delays after NICE's budget was cut and the number of appraisal committees was reduced from three to two. Since then, some reform has taken place, and we support it. However, the success of the new single technology appraisal should not be won at the cost of other drugs going through the standard procedure more slowly. Ultimately, if NICE is to meet the growing demand for new drugs, it should be provided with the resources that it needs to support three appraisal committees.

Another problem is that, although NICE was set up to tackle the postcode lottery in drugs throughout the country, its guidelines are subject to postcode lotteries—a fact recognised by the cancer tsar, Mike Richards, in his report two years ago. More recently, the Public Accounts Committee report confirmed that, one year after NICE approval, the use of herceptin for breast cancer ranged across cancer networks from 90 per cent. to under 10 per cent. of eligible women.

For one bowel cancer medicine—eloxatin—independent research found that more than one in four consultant oncologists were not able to implement new NICE guidance in the 90-day implementation period. Those clinicians cited the lack of funding as the main reason, despite the Government's extra investment in the NHS. Such regional variations must end.

The Opposition believe that we have a system that is essentially unfair. There is an inherent inequity in the system in gaining access to drugs. The postcode lottery for the availability of drugs can only be eradicated if NICE is asked to carry out full resource implementation assessments alongside its appraisals for cost and clinical effectiveness. That will help to ensure that aspirations contained in the guidance become a practical reality. The guidance will be realistic because the decisions have been costed.

Nowhere has the controversy over access to drugs been fiercer than over the funding of herceptin for early-stage breast cancers. The intervention by the Secretary of State for Health last October, when she suggested that PCTs should not withhold the drug for reasons of cost alone, has added to confusion about patient entitlement to unlicensed drugs. Inadvertently, the right hon. Lady raised the hopes and expectations of women with HER2 positive breast cancer that they would have access to that drug, but those hopes were crushed by the High Court ruling last month. If her original remarks at the Breakthrough Breast Cancer fly-in did not sufficiently create the impression that eligible women should expect primary care trusts to fund herceptin where a clinician was prepared to prescribe it, her subsequent decision to challenge North Stoke PCT certainly did. Now, there is still a postcode lottery in the prescribing of herceptin for early-stage breast cancer, as PCTs come to different decisions about the drug. That was the danger in the Secretary of State pre-empting NICE.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): My hon. Friend is well aware that the condition of the lady who fought for the drug—Barbara Clark, who is one of my constituents—has now got worse, because its use has been okayed for late-stage cancer but no one can decide when a patient's stage changes from early to late. The postcode lottery is all right if someone is late-stage, but there is still a battle. Wales has just announced that it will stop the lottery, so has Scotland. Only England has the problem. Does my hon. Friend agree that that is a farcical position for us to find ourselves in?

Mr. Baron: I completely agree. It is simply farcical that we have got ourselves into this position and it is does not look as though the situation will get better. Unless we make the recommendations to NICE that we have suggested, there will continue to be a postcode lottery and many patients will suffer as a result.

Dr. Stoate: It is impossible for NICE to make a decision on early-stage breast cancer because, as the hon. Gentleman knows, Roche only applied for a licence for herceptin in the past few days. Is he as dismayed as I am that Roche has been so slow in pushing for a licence for a drug that American studies have shown to be so useful?

Mr. Baron: The key question is: on what basis should herceptin be available now? The Secretary of State has caused confusion by intervening and overruling NICE. Primary care trusts are in a very difficult position. Some, like Swindon, will have the option of not funding herceptin if they can demonstrate doubts about its safety or clinical effectiveness. However, the PCTs that have decided to fund herceptin for early-stage breast cancer on the back of the right hon. Lady's intervention find themselves in a difficult situation. Although many trusts are struggling with deficits, the Secretary of State has not made special funding available. Local health managers face the unwelcome task of diverting funding away from other services, including those for other cancer patients, to action a political instruction from Government half way through the financial year.

It is no surprise that Pamela Goldberg, the chief executive of Breast Cancer Campaign, has said—I hope the House will forgive me for citing her comments, but they provide a powerful illustration of the situation—that the intervention

> "has caused more anxiety and confusion than clarifying the situation. Unless financial resources follow this sort of intervention we will see a situation where patients will be forced to challenge decisions on an individual basis. Primary Care Trusts have been put in a very difficult situation with their budgets already stretched to capacity."

If the point of the Secretary of State's intervention was to end the postcode lottery for herceptin, where is the evidence that that has been achieved? If it was not designed to do that, will she explain to the House what the point of her intervention was?

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The hon. Gentleman is making a measured contribution, but is he saying that, if he were the Secretary of State for Health, he would ask NICE to appraise unlicensed drugs, or that he would require PCTs to pay for herceptin and would provide central funding for that?

Mr. Baron: There are a number of issues, one of which is transitional funding. As soon as drugs become licensed, they should be appraised. The fast-track process should apply in this case. If we continue with the current system, the postcode lottery will inevitably follow. We must sort the situation out and the only way in which we can do that is by making sure that there is an appraisal process as soon as a drug is licensed and that full resource implementation takes place in tandem.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon) (Lab): I want to clarify one point about the hon. Gentleman's attitude to the postcode lottery. He has been eloquent about how much he disapproves of it, but how does that square with his leader's much-vaunted commitment to localism?

Mr. Baron: The hon. Gentleman is getting confused. At the end of the day, there is no doubt that if we aim to end the postcode lottery and have fairness in access to drugs throughout the NHS, there must be national standards and national appraisals. The bottom line is that there is a fundamental difference between standards and targets. Obviously, he has not taken that up. I am going to try to make some progress.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): Before he does, may I ask my hon. Friend whether he is not simply astonished that the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills), in making his intervention, did not mention his constituent, Anne Marie Rogers, the lady whose request for herceptin was turned down by Swindon PCT? Is not that odd? Is the hon. Gentleman saying that he likes local decision making that goes against his own constituent?

Mr. Baron: My hon. Friend makes a valid point.

Mr. Wills rose—

Mr. Baron: The hon. Gentleman should sit down. He had his go and he blew it; he did not make a worthwhile contribution. I shall try to make some progress.

I want to focus on the importance of detecting cancers early, which is vital in giving patients the best possible start to treatment. The Government's record in this area, too, is mixed. The Public Accounts Committee report highlighted the fact that a public awareness campaign on the signs and symptoms of cancer due in 2001 has still not been fully implemented. As a consequence, the report claims:

"Patients are diagnosed with cancer at a later stage in the UK than in other European countries and this particularly affects people from deprived areas in England."

A more active policy is clearly needed.

With regard to cancers in general, as part of its new role in public health, NICE should be involved in drawing up a full, evidence-based communications campaign on the signs and symptoms of cancer to encourage patients to present earlier. But if patients are going to present earlier, and in larger numbers, GPs, many of whom see only a handful of cancers each year, clearly need improved guidance on referral. According to the National Audit Office, only about half of GPs surveyed had seen departmental guidelines on spotting cancers and found them useful. That needs to be put right.

Screening, too, has an invaluable role to play in catching cancers early, but again much more needs to be done. The success of the NHS breast screening programme, introduced in 1988, clearly demonstrates how catching cancers early can save lives, and I look forward to the day when other cancers can be detected in this way. On bowel cancer screening, for example, we welcome the Government's commitment to roll out a national programme from April, but why are Ministers now obfuscating about funding?

In October 2004, the then Secretary of State made a commitment to fund the programme to the tune of £37.5 million over two years, but now the programme is said to be subject to budgetary considerations. Perhaps this Secretary of State will explain to the House what has happened to that allocation. Is bowel cancer screening now to become the latest victim of NHS deficits?

Perhaps the right hon. Lady will also explain why her Department has been so coy when asked about the future of the programme. The charities Bowel Cancer UK and Beating Bowel Cancer hand-delivered a letter to the Department on 13 December last year, inquiring about plans for national screening. However, only last week, in reply to my parliamentary questions, did Ministers acknowledge the existence of the letter and promise to reply. That really is not good enough. Bowel cancer appears to be one of the poor relations among cancers, and that needs to be put right, if only because it kills about 17,000 people a year.

Mr. James Clappison (Hertsmere) (Con): As my hon. Friend will know, this country is lagging way behind western Europe and north America in bowel screening. Has he noticed that in the Government's amendment to the motion there is no mention at all of bowel screening? Does he agree that the House would look forward to a full explanation from the Secretary of State of what the Government plan to do on that?

Mr. Baron: I do agree. As I said, bowel cancer is the poor relation among cancers, and that has been demonstrated by the lack of response from the Department on some of the issues that various charities have raised about the screening programme. I hope that the Government will shortly put that right.

On prostate cancer, various studies have cast doubt on the effectiveness of the prostate-specific antigen test, which is why we have called on the Government to give leadership to international efforts to find a reliable test for this disease, which kills almost as many men in the UK each year as breast cancer kills women. In the meantime, the prostate cancer risk management programme supports GPs in offering men an informed choice about PSA testing. However, many GPs are not even aware that support tools exist. That, too, needs to be put right.

So far we have discussed improving survival rates, but there is also a need to transform the quality of life of cancer patients. There needs to be better recognition by Government that, because more patients are living longer with cancer, cancer needs to be treated as a long-term medical condition. Patients should be given support to manage their own care as much as possible and to make informed choices about treatments where appropriate. Access to information is crucial for people living with cancer and is vital if patients are to be put in the driving seat. Yet communication issues continue to be a common cause of complaint for people with cancer.

According to the recent Public Accounts Committee report, one fifth of patients are not made fully aware of the potential side effects of treatment. About 40 per cent.

of cancer patients were not informed about cancer support or self-help groups. As well as emotional support, patients should also receive, as a matter of right, information about entitlements to benefits.

According to Macmillan Cancer Relief, three quarters of patients do not receive such advice. The last thing that patients undergoing treatment require is to have to worry about not paying bills because of low uptake of benefits to which they are entitled. Another failing of the system is that it does not adequately address what I call the black hole between health and social care, into which too many patients fall without the care and treatment that they need. The gap needs to be bridged. That is why individual needs should be assessed on a holistic basis with professionals and health and social care staff working together through multidisciplinary teams.

Specialist clinical advice and support is also extremely important. Currently, Britain has too few specialist cancer nurses. We believe that NICE should be instrumental in drawing up holistic standards and entitlements to care that address the emotional and information needs of patients throughout the entire patient pathway, and so bridge the gap between health and social care. These standards would be for the whole journey, including, perhaps, giving patients the right to die at home if they so wish.

These standards should also be enforceable. One way of achieving that would be for clinical guidelines to be the basis of contracts between NHS commissioners and providers. In short, we should aim to create a culture of entitlements to care. For example, we on the Opposition Benches are increasingly attracted to the idea of an information prescription given by GPs or specialist nurses—I am pleased to say that the Government are picking up on this—as the starting point of patient empowerment. Expertise in meeting these challenges and improving the quality of patient care already exists in the voluntary sector, and should now be harnessed by the NHS in meeting more robust professional guidelines set by NICE.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): On the subject of NICE, my hon. Friend will be aware of the arguments that relate to Alzheimer's drugs. I ask him to consider whether those arguments should apply also to cancer drugs. Should not NICE consider the economic impact on social services as much as on health services when considering the economic viability of cancer drugs?

Mr. Baron: In short, we very much agree with that. That is one criticism of the decision involving Alzheimer's drugs, in that it concentrated on health costs and benefits. The decision should have focused also on social costs and benefits, so as to bridge the gap. Cost savings could then be made with the provision of good standards of care in viewing the whole journey to the end, as it were. That is one of the faults of the system at present. It is focused too much on health and we need also to consider social care.

Reducing inequalities of outcome is not only a matter of improving survival rates. The battle against cancer must increasingly be fought by increasing awareness of risk factors and influencing lifestyle choices. This is the importance of prevention. Smoking is by no means the only risk factor that is associated with cancer. We must now put the focus on factors such as obesity, which causes about a third of all cancer deaths. Mesothelioma affects a new generation that are not aware of the risks of asbestos. They are embarking on potentially dangerous do-it-yourself renovations of old buildings, for example. There is a need for better warning about this deadly disease. These facts can be used powerfully to argue for a much better public health and awareness campaign to tackle health inequalities. We as a party were pledged to put these themes at the heart of our policies if elected last year.

As part of its new public health role and alongside communication campaigns on the symptoms of cancer, we believe that NICE should be involved in drawing up an evidence-based awareness programme of how people can alter their lifestyles to reduce risk.

The present situation is unacceptable. Despite extra investment and some improvements, Britain's cancer survival rates are still among the worst in Europe. The Government's targets focus on the front end of the patient pathway to the detriment of the latest treatments, which have been neglected. Waiting times for radiotherapy, for example, have undoubtedly increased, but the Government refuse to monitor the situation. There is still a postcode lottery in access to drugs, with British patients benefiting from new treatments later than their European counterparts. Guidance from the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence on technologies and standards of care has not been universally implemented.

The Secretary of State's intervention over herceptin unfairly raised the hopes of women with early-stage breast cancer. By failing to make specific funding available, she has put primary care trusts in an impossible situation, and she has disappointed patients. Meanwhile, services have not yet fully recognised that cancer is increasingly a long-term term condition, and should be treated as such. The black hole between health and social care needs to be addressed. In future, decisions about cancer services should be taken as much as possible by clinical experts from NICE, rather than by politicians in Whitehall.

The NHS has been a political football for too long. It is time for politicians to step back, and allow the medical professionals to get on with the job. NICE should take on a much more ambitious role in drawing up guidelines on entitlement to care. Those standards should take account of patient needs on a holistic basis, including the need for information and emotional support, and they should join up health and social services effectively. Standards must cover the entire patient journey from prevention and awareness to the later stages of curative and palliative care and, like technology appraisals, they should be enforceable. To end the postcode lottery in access to drugs and treatments, NICE guidance appraisals and recommendations should be made alongside resource implementation assessments so that national guidance is realistic and successful, enabling us to end the unfairness inherent in the system.

In short, it is almost a crime that, despite a massive increase in funding, cancer services still lag behind their European counterparts. We need an ambitious programme for the future of cancer services and a fresh approach that puts patients in the driving seat by providing them with an entitlement to standards of care, as decided by medical professionals, not the politicians; by raising treatment standards throughout the patient pathway; and by recognising quality-of-life issues, which are important to patients. For those reasons, I urge the House to support the motion.

4.52 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"recognises that the Government has made the improvement of cancer services a key priority through the implementation of the NHS Cancer Plan which sets out to reorganise and rejuvenate cancer services and has provided the NHS with investment to modernise these services; welcomes the achievements set out in the recent Public Accounts Committee report, the NHS Cancer Plan: a progress report, which acknowledged that significant progress has been made across the country; notes that the total death rate for cancer in people under 75 has fallen by 14 per cent. since 1996; acknowledges that under this Government unprecedented investment in equipment is helping to improve both access to, and reliability of, diagnosis and treatment; further notes that specialist teams have been established across the country to help deliver co-ordinated care to patients in hospitals; further welcomes the fact that the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence is introducing a new fast track assessment process to enable them to issue binding advice to the NHS on the most important new drugs within weeks of them receiving a licence; further notes that this Government has commissioned research to enable initiatives to raise awareness of the symptoms of cancer to be targeted on people most at risk; further notes that there has been a 43 per cent. increase in cancer consultants since 1997; acknowledges that there has been a 40 per cent. increase in cancers detected through breast screening; and further welcomes the Government's commitment to continuing to deliver the commitments in the NHS Cancer Plan."

I welcome the opportunity to debate the future of cancer services. I welcome, too, the way in which the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) opened the debate and the tone of much, if not quite all, of his comments. I particularly welcome his recognition that we have made significant improvements in the care of cancer patients in the past eight or nine years.

The death yesterday of the wonderful Linda Smith from ovarian cancer reminds all of us again of the terrible toll of cancer—over 4,500 deaths each year from ovarian cancer alone. This evening, many hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members, will attend an event to celebrate the life of Gregor MacKay. Gregor worked as press secretary to the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) when the right hon. Gentleman was Leader of the Opposition, but he had many friends across the political divide. He died last year aged just 36, only eight weeks after being diagnosed with lymphoma. I wish the lymphoma research fund that will be launched this evening in Gregor's memory every success, and I am sure that Opposition Members will wish to join me in doing so. There is hardly a family in the country that has not been affected by cancer in one way or another. It is one of the highest priorities for the national health service, and we have made it so.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): Cancer is an emotive issue, not least in south-east Essex, where a consultation is taking place about reconfiguring networks. The south Essex cancer network was given a special dispensation below the 1 million people threshold because we have a higher than average proportion of elderly people, who are unfortunately more likely to suffer from the disease. The network is popular and successful. Its headquarters are at the cancer centre at Southend hospital, which I am pledged to defend, as are other local MPs from south-east Essex. The network works and the centre is popular—it is not broken and we do not need anybody to fix it. Will the Secretary of State bear that in mind and look sympathetically on it?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman makes extremely important points which he and his hon. Friends are also making in the local consultation. Those decisions are best made locally, but I am sure that his comments will be fully taken into account.

In 1997, we set a target to reduce the death rate from cancer in people under 75 years old by 20 per cent. by 2010. I pay tribute to the work of the then Minister for Public Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich and West Norwood (Tessa Jowell), who was instrumental in making that commitment in the public health Green Paper. The year after that, we set the target that every patient referred by a GP with suspected cancer would be seen by a specialist within just two weeks.

In 1999, we appointed the first national director for cancer, Professor Mike Richards, whom I thank for his outstanding clinical leadership on this issue. I find it extraordinary that the hon. Member for Billericay scorns political decision making, given that we have done so much to ensure that as we set targets and improve services, we do so on the basis of the best clinical advice and outstanding clinical leadership.

In 2000, again with the full support and involvement of leading cancer specialists, patients' groups and academic experts, we launched the first ever national cancer plan. As a result, we began an unprecedented programme of investment in cancer services, with an additional £639 million extra in the past five years. We have used that investment to train and recruit new cancer specialists, so that we now have nearly 1,400 more cancer specialists in the national health service than we had in 1997.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): If we have a national plan, could the Secretary of State explain to my 10-year-old constituent, Katie Morgan from Wixhall, why her mother, Susan Morgan, and another constituent, Mrs. Margaret Bradford, are today at a public meeting in Shrewsbury trying to raise money for a £47,000-per-person herceptin treatment although that treatment is available two miles away in Wales and 10 miles away in Staffordshire? If we have a uniform comprehensive tax system, as the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) said, why do we not have comprehensive provision of this life-saving drug? Mrs. Morgan has been told by the PCT: "Your circumstances are not exceptional." Yet this is a death-dealing disease.

Ms Hewitt: I shall come to that issue in due course. I would be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would wait until I do so, because I want to deal with it in some detail.

Mr. Khan: My right hon. Friend will have heard hon. Members cherry-picking from the progress report on the Government's NHS cancer plan by the Public Accounts Committee, which is excellently chaired by the hon. Member for Gainsborough (Mr. Leigh). Far be it from me to engage in political point-scoring, but will she comment on that report? It said:

"Across the country significant progress has been made in improving cancer services and managing them more effectively, in particular, speeding access to cancer diagnosis and treatment."

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that valuable report, particularly its commendation of the significant improvements that have already taken place. Obviously we will respond to it in detail in due course.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): I am sure that the Secretary of State will join me in acknowledging the good work of the Neuroblastoma Society, even though she said in a recent written parliamentary answer that she will not offer it any support. If such great improvements have been made, will she explain to my five-year-old constituent, Isobel Sanders, why, on 9 May last year, two of the eight specialist paediatric oncology beds were closed in the Thames Valley strategic health authority because of staff shortages and why not a single bed in England and Wales was available to take her?

Ms Hewitt: I am extremely sorry to hear about what must have been a desperately anxious and agonising predicament not only for the hon. Gentleman's young constituent but for the entire family. I do not know the background to the decision, but such decisions are rightly made by hospitals, primary care trusts and strategic health authorities in local areas. I believed that that policy was supported by hon. Members of all parties. However, I greatly hope that the hon. Gentleman's constituent has received the treatment that she needed.

I am sure that all hon. Members want to thank our superb cancer staff in the NHS. Thanks to their dedication—backed by our investment—deaths from cancer have fallen by 2 per cent. a year in people under 75 and decreased especially quickly for men who suffer from lung cancer and for women with breast cancer. We are well on course to achieving the target that we set of reducing the death rate from cancer by 20 per cent. by 2010. Already, 43,000 people's lives have been saved.

The hon. Member for Billericay referred to survival rates. We should all be proud of the improvements in survival rates, although of course they are not yet good enough. In 1970, a woman with breast cancer had a 50 per cent. chance of survival. Today, the figure exceeds 80 per cent. In 1970, a patient with bowel cancer had a 25 per cent. chance of survival. By 2000, the figure was 50 per cent. Genuine improvements have therefore occurred.

I agree with the hon. Member for Billericay that cancer does not have to be a death sentence. It is increasingly a long-term condition. More and more people—some of them relatively young—are living with cancer and after cancer. They will need continued, appropriate support.

Mr. Nick Hurd (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): On that point, convenient access to care becomes increasingly important. I hope that the Secretary of State is aware of the decision to close cancer services at Mount Vernon hospital from 2012. Is the best that the British Government can offer the million or more people in the west London cancer network, for whom that site is the most convenient, a journey time of an hour and a half on public transport for cancer care?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman knows that a review of services across north-west London is taking place. The proposal is part of that review and an appropriate consultation is under way. I am sure that his points will be taken into account.

The aims of the cancer plan can be summed up very simply: prevent more, diagnose early and treat fast. I want to say something about what we have already done and what we must do on each of the three elements.

We all know that smoking is the largest single cause of cancer deaths in the United Kingdom. The ban on smoking in enclosed public places, on which the House recently decided by an overwhelming majority, will be perceived as one of the landmark Acts in the protection of public health. It builds on our work on tackling tobacco smuggling, banning tobacco advertising, placing tougher warnings on cigarette packets, and our successful NHS smoking cessation services. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Public Health recently launched our latest advertising campaign against smoking. I am especially grateful to Trudi Endersby, who was diagnosed with lung cancer at the age of 38, and had the courage to appear in that television campaign describing how she went with her daughter to choose a plot for her own grave, thus bringing home to people the dangers of smoking.

I think that all hon. Members will agree that we need to do far more to alert young people, many of whom are gambling with their future health and happiness as they turn to smoking, binge drinking and risky sexual behaviour. I particularly want to commend the work of Professor Iain Hutchison, one of our leading oral and maxillofacial surgeons and a professor of surgery at St. Bart's hospital, who founded the Saving Faces charity. He has described to me how he and his colleagues have gone into schools to show teenagers in horrifying and graphic detail what it means to have oral cancer, and to explain the impact of smoking and binge drinking on the risk of contracting oral cancer. I agree with the hon. Member for Billericay that we need more of those public awareness campaigns, and we will ensure that there are more of them in future.

So we need to do more on prevention. However, we cannot prevent every cancer, at least not with our present state of scientific and medical knowledge. It is therefore essential that we keep doing even more to detect cancer early. In 1996, 1 million women were screened for breast cancer. This year, nearly 1.5 women will be screened, and we can be proud of the fact that the breast cancer screening programme that we operate is widely regarded as one of the best in the world. The number of breast cancers detected through our screening programme has increased from some 8,500 a year to 12,000 a year, which will lead to further improvement in survival rates. The latest estimate is that that one screening programme alone is already saving the lives of about 1,400 women a year.

Mr. Khan: My right hon. Friend has talked about the importance of detection and early diagnosis. Will she commend the network of pilot clinics that has been set up at St. George's hospital to examine the links between family history and the diagnosis of cancer? The project is already a success in south London. Does she think that it could be extended further around the country?

Ms Hewitt: I commend the excellent work that is being done at St. George's. The targeted identification and screening of individuals whose family history suggests that they are at greater risk than the rest of the population will play an increasingly important part in the early diagnostic work that we do.

Mr. Gray: Is the Secretary of State saying, therefore, that, rather than screening women for breast cancer automatically when they reach 50, she might move towards automatic state-funded screening at an earlier age—possibly 40 or 45? Is that a possibility for the future?

Ms Hewitt: At this point, the evidence does not really support the case for what would be a substantial investment in universal screening for all women in their 40s. However, we are of course looking at the research on that—indeed, we are funding much of it—and we expect further results from it later this year.

Dr. Stoate: Every time in the past few years that I have referred someone with a suspected cancer, they have been seen and dealt with within two weeks. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is a fantastic tribute to the enormous amount of work being done by doctors, nurses and others in the health service to achieve such tremendous results, reassuring patients who do not have cancer and dealing rapidly with those who do? That work greatly reduces the burden of anxiety felt by patients and their families.

Ms Hewitt rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the right hon. Lady replies, may I say that ever longer and more frequent interventions are having their own impact on the time available for debate? I am sure that everyone will be conscious that the Chair is trying to fit in a maiden speech today as well.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Dr. Stoate), who speaks with enormous authority on these matters, has saved me some time by making that point. In 1997, only two thirds of patients who were referred by their GP were seen by a cancer specialist within a fortnight. So, thousands of people every year were being told by their GP that they might have cancer, but were being forced to wait in agonising uncertainty for weeks on end before they could see a specialist. The fact that, today, 99 per cent. of patients see a cancer specialist within two weeks or less is hugely important.

I know that the Conservative party does not like targets, and the hon. Member for Billericay has made that point again. The right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) told the Health Service Journal that he wants to scrap national targets. The hon. Gentleman appeared to be arguing this afternoon that those targets, by concentrating on the early part of the patient journey, are distorting clinical priorities. I have to say that I do not understand how it can be a distortion of clinical priorities to ensure that a patient whose GP fears that they might have cancer is seen by a cancer specialist within two weeks. The people involved cannot begin to worry about the late stages of the patient pathway for somebody with cancer if they have not taken the trouble to diagnose the cancer rapidly in the first place. I believe—

David Tredinnick: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Hewitt: No, I shall make progress. I believe that we were absolutely right to set that target. I believe it has relieved anxiety for thousands of patients with suspected cancer. In achieving that early diagnosis, it has contributed to saving lives.

Of course, we also have to treat people fast. That is why we set a further target—perhaps another that the Conservative party would abolish if it had the chance—that no patient should wait longer than a month from diagnosis to treatment, or more than two months from urgent referral by a GP to the start of their treatment. That is particularly important because, as the hon. Member for Billericay said, people in England—indeed, people across the UK—are more likely than those in other countries to be in an advanced stage of their cancer by the time they are treated, so getting patients not only diagnosed early, but through to their treatment as quickly as possible, is critical if we are to save people's lives and improve those survival rates.

Mr. Baron: I take on board what the Secretary of State is saying, but she seems to forget that those targets relate to first treatment. Radiotherapy, for example, is first treatment in no more than 15 to 20 per cent. of cases. The risk is that these targets ignore the fact that the cancer journey can be long. Pulling resources into the front end means that radiotherapy waiting times look set to continue to lengthen at this rate.

Ms Hewitt: We have never claimed that the patient pathway ends with the first treatment, but we have said that we must start by setting as a priority not only early diagnosis, but getting the patient through to that first treatment. The hon. Gentleman is quite right that at this stage we do not currently measure the waiting time for radiotherapy as a second treatment—in other words, after the initial surgery. We might need to do that next, which is one issue we will consider, but at this point we are seeking to ensure that we meet the one-month and the two-month targets. I believe we are absolutely right to do so.

No one in the House should underestimate the challenge posed by meeting those targets to get patients very rapidly indeed to their first treatment for this very simple reason: the NHS has never before proactively had to manage patients—each individual patient—throughout their pathway of care.

David Tredinnick: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Ms Hewitt: No, I want to make this point. Then I will give way to the hon. Gentleman, who has been very persistent.

We have never, under Governments of either party, measured the delays in diagnostic tests, the time between additional out-patient appointments, the referrals between one specialist and another, or the referrals, often for patients with complex cancers, between one hospital and another—between the secondary and the tertiary centres, for instance. All those can add to delays, uncertainties, anxiety or even mistakes. We are changing all that, and it is a pity that the hon. Member for Billericay does not recognise the scale of our ambition, or indeed our achievement.

David Tredinnick: I hope that the Secretary of State will also address the various support services in the complementary sector, which are not commonly mentioned by Ministers, such as traditional Chinese medicine and acupuncture, particularly as the Government have been pressing for a statutory register, which should be coming on-stream soon. I would be grateful for an explanation of that. What is she doing to examine the contribution of advisory services on diet and lifestyle, because, as I mentioned earlier, according to reports from America 80 per cent. of cancers are caused by lifestyle issues?

Ms Hewitt: I was not going to mention those points, as there is so much to cover, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will contribute to the debate on those matters later.

We are making remarkably good progress towards achieving the targets that we have set for prompt first treatment. Between July and September last year, nearly 95 per cent. of patients had commenced their first treatment within 31 days of being diagnosed, and more than 80 per cent. of patients were treated within 62 days of being referred urgently by their GP. There is still much more to do on that, but we have made remarkable progress already.

I want to deal with the issue of cancer drugs, and particularly herceptin, which has rightly been a focus of much of the debate already. I pay tribute to the superb campaigning of Barbara Clarke—who is taking an interest in this debate—and other women. When we heard the results of the initial clinical trials last year, which suggest that herceptin can make a very significant difference to perhaps one in four women who are HER2 positive and have been diagnosed with breast cancer, we immediately considered the implications for the national health service. In particular, I took steps, with the support of Professor Richards, to ensure that HER2 testing will be available across England to all women diagnosed with early-stage breast cancer, so that they and their clinicians will know whether they might be able to benefit from the drug.

The hon. Member for Billericay is right, however, to point to the difficulties that arise with drugs, not only herceptin, that are neither licensed nor evaluated by NICE for use. We have made it clear as general guidance for many years that no primary care trust should refuse any treatment on the blanket grounds that it has neither been licensed nor evaluated, because it is entirely possible for a clinician to prescribe treatment that is neither licensed nor evaluated—or that might have been licensed but not evaluated—and for a primary care trust to fund that treatment. In the light of the risk that herceptin might be ruled out because it was not licensed, not evaluated, or solely on grounds of funding, I added to the guidance already issued by making it clear that primary care trusts should not refuse herceptin purely on grounds of cost.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: The Secretary of State is right. Herceptin is licensed for late-stage breast cancer, however, and has been for some time. Barbara Clarke's campaign was to get it licensed for early-stage breast cancer. Does the Secretary of State agree that if that could be rolled out across the whole United Kingdom—it is already in Scotland and Wales—we would resolve the problems that my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) was talking about?

Ms Hewitt: I was about to explain why we cannot do what the hon. Gentleman suggests at this point. In fact, I am not sure what he was suggesting; I think he was quite confused about it. He asked for national standards. That was our aim in setting up NICE: we wanted to end the lottery of postcode prescribing. NICE, however, cannot evaluate a drug before a licence has been applied for. It simply does not have the information that will enable it to evaluate the drug if the manufacturers who have that information from the clinical trials have not yet submitted it to the licensing authority.

Although, as the hon. Gentleman says, herceptin has been licensed for some time to treat late-stage breast cancer, it has not been licensed for early-stage treatment. When a fast-track licence was requested from the licensing authorities, the clinicians involved in the decision took the view that it would be wrong to put herceptin through a fast-track process for early-stage treatment because of serious concern about side-effects relating to heart disease. That is not a worry if a woman is in the late stages of breast cancer, but it can be of significant concern if the woman is in the early stages.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger rose—

Ms Hewitt: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman again at this stage. I have been pretty generous.

Mr. Wills: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way, especially as my intervention relates to a constituent. I am sure that she was well aware of the case even before the premature intervention of my neighbour, the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray). I shall leave the House to judge whether it was inappropriate.

As my right hon. Friend knows, I have written to her several times on behalf of my constituent. I think that everyone who considers that case, and indeed the whole issue, realises just how difficult and delicate such matters are at this stage in the development of drugs. I welcome my right hon. Friend's rapid and sensitive intervention last year in an attempt to deal effectively with a very difficult issue. May I ask her, however—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has gone on for far too long. I have already appealed for brevity, and indeed for fewer interventions, if we are to have any debate at all involving Back Benchers.

Ms Hewitt: I will be guided by you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, my hon. Friend has raised an extremely important and difficult case, to which I referred in a written statement earlier today. As an appeal is pending, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on the individual case, which is of course particularly difficult and painful for the individual concerned and her family. I think we all recognise that.

As I have said, NICE cannot begin to evaluate a drug or a new application before a licence has been applied for. What we did—I pay tribute to the Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Wavertree (Jane Kennedy), who did much of the work—was enable the NICE evaluation to be speeded up, for herceptin in particular but also for a number of other drugs, especially cancer drugs. We did that by ensuring that, rather than having to wait until the licence is granted, in cases such as this NICE can begin its evaluation as soon as the licence is applied for. I can confirm that it has begun its evaluation of herceptin, following Roche's recent and welcome application for a licence.

The first five drugs to be subjected to the new faster process—the single technology appraisal by NICE—are cancer drugs. We expect the evaluation of herceptin to be completed within a few weeks of the granting of the licence, but until the evaluation has been completed and the licence granted, it would be wholly wrong for me as Secretary of State to overrule or prejudge the decisions of either the licensing authority or NICE. The hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire appeared to be saying that I should not do so. It is a pity that he has not supported me.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) (Con): The question surely is this. The Secretary of State chose to intervene last October. It surely cannot be her proposition that primary care trusts are obliged not to refuse treatment on grounds of cost alone. She intervened in respect of herceptin. When NICE conducts an evaluation, it automatically feeds through into the resources that are made available to PCTs. There is no NICE evaluation. Therefore, no resources to support herceptin are allocated to PCTs in their overall allocation. The Secretary of State gave the impression that PCTs would be funded to provide herceptin if they thought that it was clinically appropriate, but she did nothing of the sort.

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. What I said at the time I made my statement was that I recognised full well the difficult financial position that some primary care trusts found themselves in, and that they would have to make difficult decisions on priorities in order to ensure that herceptin was not denied purely on grounds of cost, but I think that he labours under a misapprehension. As we have set out clearly, when NICE evaluates a drug and makes a positive recommendation, the NHS then has three months to ensure that its recommendation is followed. However, the NHS is expected to do that within the funding that it has already been given. There is not a separate pot of money sitting in the Department of Health waiting to be allocated as each NICE evaluation is made.

We have given primary care trusts, the local NHS, more money than ever before and devolved to them some 85 per cent. of the total health budget—a devolution of resources that I would have thought the hon. Gentleman supported—it is simply not possible to say, for each new drug that comes along, when it is positively evaluated by NICE, "Here is more money for that drug." It would not be a sensible way to allocate resources.

The resources are allocated in a single pot. They are not ring-fenced for a particular drug. They are not even ring-fenced for drugs as a whole. It is up to the local NHS, the PCT, to decide its priorities and to get the best value for money to ensure that patients receive the best possible health care and that funding is released for new drugs and therapies as they become available.

Mr. Paterson: Can the Secretary of State explain in simple terms to a 10-year-old constituent of mine why their parents, who have paid their taxes, are having to spend a day in Shrewsbury starting to raise £47,000, when their neighbours two miles away in Wales are getting the drug? We do not have national health, or so-called national care, but we do have national comprehensive taxation.

Ms Hewitt: The NHS in Wales, for which, of course, I am not responsible—that is a devolved matter—looks to NICE, as indeed much of the rest of the world does, for the evaluation. I make decisions about the NHS in England. I believe, and I thought at least at one point in the speech by the hon. Member for Billericay that he agreed, that it would be wrong for a politician to override, pre-empt or prejudge the decisions that should rightly be made by the independent licensing authority and by NICE.

Mr. Baron: I believe that the Secretary of State is somewhat confused herself. Does not she realise that, by intervening as she did, that is precisely what she did? She overruled NICE—she pre-empted NICE, I should say; I apologise. She caused confusion. She has not given extra budgetary finance to those PCTs that want perhaps to bring it in. That has caused more of a postcode lottery than existed previously.

Ms Hewitt: I am sorry but the hon. Gentleman is wrong. I was very careful in everything I said on the subject last year not to pre-empt NICE. If he cares to ask Professor Mike Rawlins, the chair of NICE, he will find that Professor Rawlins and I are in complete agreement on that point.

As I said earlier, we have said for some years that PCTs should not deny or withhold treatment on a blanket basis—simply on the grounds that a drug is neither licensed nor evaluated. In addition, I have specified that they should not withhold funding for herceptin on a blanket basis purely on the ground of cost; rather, they must consider each individual case. If a PCT decides not to fund such treatment, that decision can of course be reconsidered on appeal by the clinical exceptions committee. The more that such decisions are taken by clinicians, the better.

I shall end my remarks—I am conscious that a number of colleagues wish to speak—by referring to the surveys carried out by the National Audit Office between 2000 and 2004, which have confirmed the significant improvements in cancer treatment to which I have already referred. They show that fewer patients reported a deterioration in their condition while waiting for treatment. Of course, fewer patients now wait weeks or even months for treatment—a wait that was, I am afraid, a feature of cancer treatment in the past. Perhaps most crucially of all, nearly nine out of 10 cancer patients reported that they were treated with dignity and respect at all times.

We are just halfway through implementing the national cancer plan. As I believe Members in all parts of the House will accept, we have already made great progress, but as I would be the first to acknowledge, there is a great deal more that we have to do. But given our continuing investment in cancer services and the record sums going into the national health service; given our confidence that by the end of 2008—after two more years of record increases—we will have achieved the European average in health care funding; given the extra specialists, the new drugs and the continuing drive for an improved patient experience and proper support throughout the cancer journey; given the provision of better advice and more choice and control for patients; and given the provision of more care in or near the home, as reinforced by our recent White Paper, I believe that we are well on the way to making Britain's cancer services among the best in the world.

All the progress that we have already made and will make as we continue on this course in the years to come would be jeopardised by the new fiscal rule announced by the Leader of the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Witney, as confirmed in his most recent statement. That "proceeds of growth" rule would inevitably mean cuts in the NHS budget—thereby reversing the progress that we have made—longer waiting lists, fewer specialists and poorer services for cancer patients.

Much has been done but there is more to do and we have an absolute determination to do it. I commend the amendment to the House.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): I know that the House is keen that Back Benchers have the chance to speak before the winding-up speeches begin, and although this is a very important topic that, to judge by the contributions that we have heard so far, deserves a lot more time than has been allocated to it this afternoon, I will curtail my remarks, not least in the hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie) can catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and make his maiden speech.

I want to focus on the crucial issue of cancer drugs and access to them, but first I want to place on the record my support for the 10-year cancer plan, which, as has rightly been said, has made an important contribution. However, I hope that the Government will say whether and when they plan to renew and refresh that plan, because we do not want it more or less to expire, and then to be presented with a new 10-year plan. Cancer treatment provision and cancer prevention is a long-term process, so we need a long lead time into the next stage of the cancer plan. I therefore hope that the Minister can tell us this evening when we will get the shape of the next plan, rather than waiting until the current one ends. We need a longer-term horizon than that.

I turn briefly to the important issue of the "prescription for change" campaign by Breast Cancer Care, which has highlighted an anomaly. People diagnosed with breast cancer or other cancers would once have died shortly thereafter; now, they can expect to live for much longer, but as a result they suffer prescription charges, whereas people with other conditions, such as diabetes, do not. Prescription charges are causing problems for cancer patients. For example, the Minister may not be aware that a Breast Cancer Care survey found that 15 per cent. of cancer patients had not taken up the prescriptions given to them by doctors because of their cumulative cost. There is an arbitrariness in the prescription system, for example between diabetes and cancer. That was not so important in the late 1960s, when the rules were drawn up, but it is a problem now. The present system can be defended only on the grounds that it is the one that we have got and that changing it would open up a can of worms. However, that is not a good enough reason not to look at it.

I shall focus on the question of access to expensive new drugs. We will talk about herceptin today, but there will always be another new drug just around the corner. Herceptin is going through the NICE licensing process for use in early-stage breast cancer, and we hope that it will soon be approved, but our answer to the question of access must work every time, for each expensive new treatment that comes along.

My comments are informed by a meeting that I had yesterday with oncologists from Addenbrooke's hospital. They wrote to me and other hon. Members last July about the inaccessibility of herceptin, and said:

"As a group, we are conservative"— with a small "c" in that context, I am pleased to say—

"in our response to new treatments. We usually strongly resist pressure to switch our patients to new and expensive drugs for marginal benefits. But the recent trial data demand immediate action since these are certainly the most stunning results that any of us has seen during our entire professional careers."

It is interesting to note that, since the oncologists wrote that letter, their patients can now access the unlicensed drug herceptin for early-stage breast cancer. It was their clinical judgment that that should happen, but other PCTs have concluded that that would not be the right thing to do for clinical reasons. How can such matters be dealt with systematically? That is the important question, as our constituents sense that the present requirements are unacceptable.

The hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) said the same, but did not propose a solution. I agree that it cannot be right that a woman suffering from breast cancer should have to go to court to get herceptin. The hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) has intervened more than once to say that it cannot be right either that a woman who happens to live in Shrewsbury cannot get herceptin, while one who lives in Staffordshire or somewhere else nearby can. Neither circumstance can be right, but we have not heard how such inconsistencies are dealt with in connection with drugs that are neither licensed nor approved by NICE. I shall make my own suggestion about that in a moment.

Some key questions on herceptin remain unanswered. First, what have the Government done to try and get it more cheaply? On average, the NHS pays more for drugs than most other health services—a fact confirmed to me in a written answer from the Department. Have we used the buying power of the NHS to beat down the providers and get a better price? That approach must be both sensible and desirable, although I understand that the producers need their research budgets and an incentive to carry out research. That means that there is a limit on how far prices can be brought down but, if other health services can do it, why cannot ours?

Secondly, the hon. Member for Billericay said that other European countries adopt new drugs much earlier than we do. Why is that? Many other European countries have better survival rates than the UK, and that is very closely linked to our failure to take up new drugs earlier. Why do the Government think that our health service is, on average, slower to adopt new treatments? What assessment has been made of that?

On unlicensed drugs, I stress that I am speaking for myself, and that I do not ascribe my views to the consultants to whom I spoke yesterday. However, they pointed out that unlicensed drugs are used all over the place and said, "Paediatricians do it all the time." Licensing is for the benefit of patients, and is about patient safety. If patients are told that the trials and tests of a drug remain incomplete and that there is a risk attached to its use, they might still conclude that they are not willing to accept the risk of not using the drug. In those circumstances, why should the patients be told that they cannot take an unlicensed drug, simply because it is unlicensed? That cannot be right.

The fact that a drug is unlicensed should not be a barrier, but we do not have a system for the systematic appraisal of unlicensed drugs by clinicians who want to give them to their patients. Such a system would mean that the use of new drugs would not vary by postcode, or require people who want them to go to court. That is the sort of system that we need, and I shall make a suggestion to that effect in a moment.

I share the concern that has been expressed about the Secretary of State's intervention last October. She made a statement on 5 October that reiterated the undertaking that herceptin would be fast-tracked when it was brought forward for licensing. Obviously, we welcomed that. However, that statement, subsequent clarification by the Department of Health on the same day and the Secretary of State's speech to Breakthrough Breast Cancer have, according to a PCT guidance note on access to herceptin:

"raised considerable expectation that NHS patients will, from now, be prescribed"

"even though the announcement relates only to provision of testing".

Whether the Secretary of State likes it or not, she clearly raised expectations. She must accept that, because there is plenty of evidence that people heard that on the news and concluded that she was telling trusts not to refuse to prescribe it. I know that she said that they were not to refuse to prescribe it on cost grounds, but does she seriously think that if herceptin cost £1 a dose any PCT in Britain would refuse its use to clinicians who asked for it? That is patently not so. If clinicians had judged that herceptin, although unlicensed, was in the best interests of their patients—and the patients knew the risks and were willing to take them—no PCT would say no in those circumstances.

Mr. Lansley: Strictly speaking, some clinicians would say no in those circumstances. For example, in the Thames Valley strategic health authority, advice has been derived from a joint professional group that clinicians should say no to herceptin, on the grounds of the risk associated with an increase in coronary heart disease.

Steve Webb: I was talking about primary care trusts saying no when clinicians said yes. If clinicians have a patient whom they believe would be ideally suited to the treatment, they have explained the risks and the patient is prepared to take those risks because the alternative would be worse, the money would be found for herceptin if it were not so expensive. That is cost rationing, and it is no good pretending that this is not about cost. The Secretary of State told trusts not to say no on grounds of cost alone, but that clearly raised expectations that cannot be met. That is the danger of the Secretary of State intervening as she did.

We have all heard about the North Stoke case. How can it be right that one person gets the treatment because they have got on the news, the Secretary of State has thrown her weight around and, the next day, the PCT changes its mind, but another woman, who does not get on the news, does not get the treatment? That is not a rational way to allocate those treatments.

My local PCT in south Gloucestershire does not fund herceptin, on clinical grounds, because there is an academic study that says that four years down the track the chance of surviving is enhanced by only 5 per cent. However, that study was based on a broad category of women. I put that point to the consultants at Addenbrooke's yesterday and they said that out of the big sample one could pick sub-groups who have a far better chance of survival. The drug is ideally suited to some women, for whom the statistics would be much better. My local PCT has picked one study and interpreted it in a particular way and will not prescribe herceptin, but if my constituent who needs the treatment were living in Cambridge, she would get it. That cannot be acceptable.

It is all very well identifying the problem, but what should we do? We need a mechanism for allocating unlicensed and unapproved drugs. We cannot continue with the random and arbitrary approach that we take now. That has to be done nationally. The hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) was right to identify a conflict between a belief in localism, local discretion and responsiveness to local circumstances, and consistency and avoiding postcode lotteries. On many things, my colleagues and I are on the side of the localists. We want local discretion over patterns of service and provision. However, I do not think that any of our constituents believe that it is right that whether a patient gets a drug should depend on where they live. That does not come into the category of decisions that our constituents believe should be made case by case, on a local basis. Therefore, we need a central evaluation process for such treatment, pre-NICE. The alternative is arbitrariness—randomness, going to court, postcode lottery—on treatments that could save lives. It must be one or the other. We cannot have both.

That arbitrariness so offends our constituents' sense of natural justice that we cannot go on. Yes, the problems with herceptin will be sorted in six months—we hope—but the next set of problems will not be. Clinicians tell me that avastin will be the next cancer wonder drug and that it will make herceptin look cheap, so we have to tackle the issue. Such drugs will first be unlicensed and then licensed but not approved. The faster the NICE approval process, the shorter the pre-NICE process I suggested, but it will have to exist, otherwise there will be only the arbitrariness and unfairness that we all feel offends against our sense of natural justice.

It is no good pretending that there will not always be rationing, but it must be systematic and consistent—

Julia Goldsworthy (Falmouth and Camborne) (LD): And rational.

Steve Webb: Indeed. If there is a national process for a limited period for a limited number of treatments, it will be better than the present arbitrariness. I hope that the Government will give the proposal serious thought.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. Before I call the next speaker, I point out that the 10-minute limit on Back-Bench speeches applies from now on, but as many Members are seeking to catch my eye it would obviously be more than helpful to all of us if people could take a little less than their allocated time.

5.46 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East) (Lab): I am pleased that the Opposition have chosen to debate the future of cancer services today, because this morning, in my constituency, the groundbreaking ceremony was held for the inauguration of the new Oxford cancer centre at the Churchill hospital site. It would be difficult to find a better pointer to the progress we are making in cancer care and treatment and to further improvement in the future.

The new £109 million centre, due to open in 2008, brings together cancer services that are currently scattered across three sites—the Radcliffe infirmary, the John Radcliffe hospital and outdated buildings on the Churchill site. It will combine all the clinical teams—surgeons, oncologists and support staff—in one place, providing prompt diagnosis and even more effective treatment, thereby contributing to fulfilment of the national cancer plan and improving outcomes by enabling more patients to come to Oxford for specialist cancer treatments that can most effectively be provided only in more specialist centres.

Patients will benefit from still closer collaboration with Oxford university, ensuring that their care is informed by the most advanced research into new cancer treatments. The new centre will include a women's health service, with a dedicated ward where patients with gynaecological or breast cancers will be cared for. Like most of the other patients, they will be able to have all diagnostic tests and treatment, whether surgery, chemotherapy or radiotherapy, on the same site.

The building, which will include a geothermal heating system pumping up heat from 120 m below ground level, was designed with advice from cancer patients themselves, who particularly wanted it to be as light as possible and to include many natural materials. Involving cancer patients in the design of such an important new facility is an extremely positive development.

Such a level of investment in cancer services just would not be happening if the Opposition had had their way when they voted against increased funding of the health service and, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, it would be at risk in the future if they had the chance to bring in their proceeds of growth rule, which would hold public spending to a lower rate of growth than the economy as a whole, regardless of the need for investment in public services. What is more, in Oxford, as elsewhere, cancer patients and services are benefiting from the fulfilment of the ambitious targets that the Opposition want to remove.

In January, every patient referred to the John Radcliffe under the two-week maximum wait rule was seen within the target time, and the number of cancer patients seen within two weeks is three times more than it was as recently as 2000—we cannot go back as far as 1997. That achievement is a result of the extra resources for staff, the better organisation of services and the streamlining and improving of patient access to cancer services across the trust.

In the past three years in Oxfordshire, the NHS has invested an extra £4 million in cancer services. New consultant oncologist, surgical and nurses specialist posts are examples of the investment in the clinical work force who are providing cancer care. The introduction of one-stop clinics, faster access to diagnostics and other improvements have particularly benefited gynaecology and urology services.

Most importantly, though, staff at all levels have gone the extra mile to ensure patients get a better, faster service—for example, by working extra hours to clear any backlog of patients who are awaiting radiotherapy. Since November, they have succeeded in maintaining no waiting time at all for new patients referred for radiotherapy. No praise is high enough for the staff who are achieving that performance through their dedication.

Getting to the current performance has been a challenge, and sustaining it will be a challenge, too. The trust will need to recruit more medical, nursing and other support staff to sustain the highest delivery performance, particularly for some clinical services, such as paediatric oncology and radiotherapy.

BEST COPY AVAILBLE

In high cost areas such as Oxford, there is a certain vulnerability to staff shortages in specialisms that are experiencing a national shortage, such as therapy radiologists and physicists. That makes the national drive to train and recruit more people in those specialisms especially crucial. It also means that the battle to provide more homes in central Oxfordshire is not just a housing policy, but a health service priority as well.

Another challenge is to get right the tariff for payment by results, which is particularly crucial for specialist centres as they move towards foundation status. It would be helpful if the Minister said more about the prospects for the announcement of the tariff following its recent withdrawal after it had been sent out. Clearly, it would be better if hospitals avoided such uncertainty just weeks away from the new financial year.

On the funding of new cancer drugs, hospitals and PCTs will clearly face continuing difficult pressures. The NICE procedures are the right way to resolve fairly and objectively which drugs are cost-effective and should therefore be available, but the difficult question remains of where cost-effective might not necessarily mean affordable.

A judgment that is fair to all must take account of what other treatments and which other patients are displaced by the resource consequences of such difficult decisions. That is why the Opposition Front-Bench team's proposition of handing everything over to NICE simply will not work. Surely, commissioners must be ultimately responsible for those decisions, but we all know that the minute that one PCT comes to a different conclusion from another, there will be cries of "postcode lottery".

Unlike the Opposition Front-Bench team, I do not think that there is an easy answer. Clearly, a consensus is needed on how to deal with those difficult choices. Although, as ever, I followed with interest the comments of the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb), I am not sure whether he has necessarily got the answer. Further close attention and public debate must be given to this vital issue.

I could not speak in a health service debate without raising the continuing problem of the current year's financial deficit and its impact in Oxfordshire. I do not for a moment think that the remaining deficit can be eliminated in the weeks that remain of this financial year, and as Ministers come to accept that, the question will shift to one of on whose books the deficit most properly belongs—an issue of more than accountancy significance, because of its impact on finances next year. As things stand at the moment, all the deficit would be left with the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals trust, but that would not be right, given that the financial problems in Oxfordshire are not all of the Radcliffe's making.

A fairer and more rational allocation of the deficit needs to be found. That would be better for patient care, as well as for the finances at the Oxford Radcliffe hospitals trust, which has made enormous progress in recent years in turning round its financial position and costs, as well as in delivering the first-rate cancer care about which I have been speaking, and I am confident that, with the investment that Labour is making, that will go from strength to strength in the future.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): I am glad to follow the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) and I agreed with much of what he had to say, particularly when he was talking about the great advances in cancer care in England in the past 10 or 20 years. However, quite frankly, it would have been rather surprising if those advances had not taken place. It would have been a scandal if we had been saying in today's debate that cancer services were precisely where they were in 1997, 1987, or 1967.

Although things have got a great deal better, I disagreed with the right hon. Gentleman when he became party political and seemed to indicate that that change was because of the Labour party. That was rather reminiscent of comments made by the right hon. Member for Airdrie and Shotts (John Reid), who, at the Labour party conference in 2004, said:

> "in the first 6 years of this government, the death rate from cancer is down by over 10 per cent . . . Isn't that just the sort of thing Labour came into government to do? . . . Thousands of real people walking the street who would not have survived under the last Tory Government."

That sort of remark—and one or two of the comments made by the right hon. Member for Oxford, East—is quite wrong. The achievements have been made thanks to scientists, clinicians and doctors.

I speak from personal experience. About this time last year, during the general election campaign, my wife was diagnosed with breast cancer. We were somewhat discombobulated by the surgeon, who told us that the operation would be on 5 May. We had to tell him that we would be otherwise engaged then and would have to delay the operation by a week or so. I am glad to say that the subsequent care that my wife received was excellent in every possible way and that she has been given a clean bill of health. I pay tribute to the care workers at the Royal United hospital in Bath, and at Chippenham, Swindon and elsewhere, who achieved that. However, I have to say—I hope that this will not disappoint the Minister—that I do not thank the Labour party for achieving my wife's good health; I pay tribute to the scientists and health workers. It is probably wrong to reduce the matter to a party political issue.

That is why I welcome the positive tone of the motion. We are saying how well things have gone: a lot of money has been spent and a great deal has been achieved. However, the truth of the matter is that there is an enormous amount more to achieve. We do not know the cause of breast cancer. For example, why does it almost not exist in the far east? Is that something to do with health and diet? It probably is. Why is there a high incidence of breast cancer among left-handed women? We do not know, but it would be useful to find out. We need to spend more money on research. My wife happens to be left-handed, which is why I know that statistic.

On care, of course it is good that we have a target of people being seen by a specialist 14 days after they are first diagnosed by a GP, but the average waiting time in 1997 was only 11 days, so the much-vaunted 14-day target is not particularly useful. What it does result in, as I discovered when I accompanied my wife on that fateful day, is a waiting room packed full of people. I said to the surgeon, "Why are the waiting times so long? Why do we have to sit here from 8.30 am to 2 pm before being seen by you?" He said, "That is to achieve the two-week target. We cannot lay down when people are diagnosed. They have to be seen within two weeks and the clinic has to be jammed full to achieve that target. If we were allowed a certain flexibility in terms of days, it might be easier to organise timetables better." The targets may sometimes have the wrong results and are not all that they are cracked up to be.

We have to see some improvements in waiting times for treatments. My wife heard today that she will receive her radiotherapy within four weeks, but many women are still waiting for six weeks or longer. Surgery and chemotherapy tend to be done in good time, but there is a long delay on radiotherapy, even though it is an important part of the treatment.

There has been a terrific muddle with the prescribing of drugs. We have heard a great deal about herceptin, but the same situation will apply over the years to come to a variety of other groundbreaking new cancer drugs. We need to find a way in which NICE can license and approve them speedily. We cannot have another situation like the one last October when the Secretary of State encouraged women at the Breakthrough Breast Cancer event—I was there—to think that herceptin would become available, only for them to discover that it will become available only if there is plenty of money to pay for it, which there is not.

The experience of Anne Marie Rogers, in my neighbouring constituency of North Swindon, is a vehement comment on the awful effects on women who are discovering that they may face a shortened life as a result not of anything to do with clinicians, but of a shortage of money and of Government decisions. An awful lot needs to be done in that respect and in relation to radiotherapy. In particular, an awful lot needs to be done on research.

I pay tribute to the very high standard of care that my family have benefited from in the last 12 months, and I think that we see that across the book. I do not accept that that is anything whatever to do with the Labour Government. It seems to me that science is developing quickly and that wonderful support and services are provided by doctors, nurses and researchers in our hospitals, and I pay tribute to them. I very much hope that, 10 years from now, we will have seen the statistics improve even further, and that when a Conservative Secretary of State is standing at that Dispatch Box he does not fall into the easy trap of claiming that as a Conservative victory.

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North) (Lab): This has been a very British debate. We should really be celebrating the excellent and magnificent work that has been carried out in cancer services since 1990, but particularly since 1997. I speak as someone who has chaired the all-party cancer group since 1998 and who worked in the field for many years, with patients and doing research.

You may remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you and I once put some bricks into a wall around an accelerator at Ipswich hospital, some time after a Labour Government came to power. There are many such stories to be told.

Why did I set up the all-party group? People were in the habit of setting up an all-party group for every part of the body that got cancer. Somebody once asked me if they could have an all-party group on right-knee cancer, and at that point I said, "No way. You can work within the bigger all-party cancer group. There is no reason why things cannot be considered under that umbrella."

I remember, too, a Select Committee report on cancer in the 1990s, after the Labour Government came to power, which came up with the idea of joining two major cancer charities, the Imperial Cancer Research Fund—hon. Members will remember that name—and the Cancer Research Campaign. At a meeting we were told by a man who became a Nobel prize-winner in this country, a scientist backed by British money and British technicians and workers in various universities and institutes in this country, that those two charities could never merge. One reason was that they were like Omo and Daz. That did not fool me because those two products are made of the same chemical substance and can be mixed.

The scientist also said that the charities would not get as much money if they came together. They fund most of the research in this country, and that came about through support not only from the Select Committee but from the Government. The charities get twice as much money now as the total that they got acting singly, which means that more research is being done, more projects are being funded and more young people are being given the opportunity to discover things. Although it is true that science has moved on and discovered much in cancer, it has been supported to a huge extent by the Labour Government.

I sometimes feel like going back and doing research because I have had many grants turned down, and I would have a much better chance now. I see that the Minister agrees that I should go back, before a few more votes are taken. I do not think that cancer research has ever been in a better state. In 1992, to give the Opposition credit, they implemented the Calman-Hine report so that the process started, but the acceleration really happened in 1997 and 1998.

I think too that there is a new understanding, and that is the essential feature. We used to teach students that genetics had nothing to do with cancer; it was all environment. Genetics has everything to do with cancer. We understand the causes of a genetic change that brings about a rogue cell that develops into a cancer. [Interruption.] I see that the Opposition are coming in to listen.

Understanding those genetic changes allows people to target drug development. Herceptin is one such drug, glivec is another, and there will be many more. We are also going to understand the genetic basis of who will benefit from treatment with a drug and who will not. That has been pioneered in Dundee using a certain drug. Now, in this field, genetics is all, and making that discovery has given us Nobel prizes—prizes that, incidentally, were won working not on cancer cells but on yeast cells. That shows that basic blue-skies research can often turn up things that have a medical advantage, and we should remember that.

We have had two British Nobel prize-winners at a time when we thought we were losing out. There are more to follow. I predict that, in the not-too-distant future, work being done at Dundee university will win a Nobel prize. Scotland deserves another one.

There is a new subject called bioinformatics, which is all about fancy computers, that allows us to look at amazing pieces of information. There was a shortage of people when bioinformatics were first discovered. We are now making up for that shortage by training people in colleges and elsewhere. We are punching our weight in this area. We shall make many more discoveries and we are supporting young people who are trying to develop career structures. We are enticing them. We are trying to change science in medicine that is taught in schools. Why should pupils in schools not be taught about cancer, for example? That is a good example of the things that we have done, the things that we can do and, if we get down to it and get more support from Government, the things that will happen in future. We maintain our position very well throughout the world.

I give credit to my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who mentioned the work at Oxford. He did not mention—I was proud of this—a young 16-year-old who was leading a demonstration at Oxford that was supporting limited animal experiments. We are not saying that all work should be done with animals, and perhaps some of it should be done with computers and tissue cells, for example. The right to be able to do that is so important. Before a licence, there is a need for the toxic test. We do not stick drugs into patients and hope that they do not die. Certain tests have to be carried out in the hope that results will be obtained before the licence.

The changes that are coming about in scientific discovery will make a real difference. Quite often in science and medicine, discoveries happen long before politicians, particularly those who are lawyers, can pick up on what they might mean in terms of new laws and regulations, for example. We have genetic modification and stem cells. Many of us knew about stem cells before the many debates in this place that led to us ensuring that we could continue with research. We are hopeful that that research might pay off.

Much has been said about the cancer plan that came through for 10 years. We are halfway through that. Many new people have been appointed. Consultants are pouring out of oncology departments in our hospitals, and there are more to come. This is real encouragement. For the health service in general, such developments have stimulated mental health people and those who work in cardiology, heart disease and so on. How did these people do it? I will tell the House: politicians, scientists and medics worked together. There is huge team work. There are 20 cancer research charities and voluntary groups that meet once a week in this place to discuss various issues from a professional, knowledgeable position. That is what we have created since 1997, and that is important. Let us do away with competition and get people working together who have the best experiences.

I heard a woman from the Christie in Manchester talking about best practice there. She was telling 19 other people how it was done. That is excellent, and that atmosphere should be encouraged. We have talked about NICE and quality of life. People with cancer, in their last few years or days, experience tremendous fatigue. We can do things about that. There is the stimulation of blood, for example, which will stop these people being tired. NICE should be asked to examine that.

Of course, NICE will evolve. It will learn by some of the mistakes that have been made. That is what it has all been about. Thank goodness that NICE has been in place to give us some evidence-based knowledge of what we do and of what we do not know. That knowledge will increase.

The vision that we have in the all-party group—please join it—is how we are going to take things on. We realise that cancer is a complete journey from the early diagnosis, through treatment and then on to care in hospices, including palliative care. The passport needs to be examined. There should be no piecemeal approach when it comes to putting in money. The patient should be considered throughout.

I am excited about what is happening, but I think that there is more to do. What we have managed to do in providing better cancer services will stimulate us to do even better, as we learn more. That knowledge will come from science, medicine and practice. We have an enthusiastic work force who want to try to do things. In the light of experiments and clinical trials—more and more of that is going on with the necessary resources—we shall learn best practice.

6.9 pm

Willie Rennie (Dunfermline and West Fife) (LD): I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the opportunity to give my maiden speech and to contribute to our debate on cancer services.

It is a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), who has a distinguished record on cancer and in science, which is close to my heart. It is an interesting and bewildering experience to enter Parliament outside the usual intake, and I thank colleagues on both sides of the House who have helped and supported me in the past couple of weeks. When my predecessor, Rachel Squire, was elected in 1992, she brought to the House a background in social work and union representation. She brought, too, a passionate belief in the importance of equality of opportunity for women. Most importantly, she brought a warm personality and a strength of character that was appreciated on both sides of the House. Her death this year from a brain tumour was a tragedy for all who knew her. What struck me most was her dedication to her constituents, for whom she fought with tenacity. I hope to do just the same.

Dunfermline is the historic capital of Scotland. Indeed, the body of Robert the Bruce, who gave the town its charter in 1322, is buried in Dunfermline abbey. I share my constituents' pride in the city's architecture, which includes our very own Carnegie hall, donated by Andrew Carnegie, the most celebrated of Dunfermline's sons. Many visitors enjoy a stroll down the glen, which is maintained by bonds donated by Andrew Carnegie. Dunfermline, like many cities, has had its ups and downs. Daniel Defoe commented in the 18th century that it showed the "full perfection of decay". The city is not in such a plight today, but many parts are run-down, with the old Co-op site blighting our city centre. That is a cause that I intend to take up on behalf of my constituents. Dunfermline was once a magnet for Scotland, and I believe that, in time, it can become so again.

One advantage of fighting a by-election is that it draws in political representatives of all the major parties form all parts of the country. Never has Dunfermline seen so many MPs, including my party's three excellent leadership contenders. It seems that visitors were struck, as I have always been, by the landscape, the history of the city and the friendliness of the people. I am sure that that is the only explanation for the fact that so many Labour Members missed the vote on the Racial and Religious Hatred Bill. I certainly hope that the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron) enjoyed his visit to Dunfermline high street. My Liberal Democrat colleagues look forward to welcoming him to their constituencies, following the dramatic effect of his visit to my constituency on the Conservative vote.

The constituency reaches as far west as Kincardine, which will soon have a second crossing across the Forth thanks to investment by my colleagues in the Scottish Executive. In fact, the decision to invest in the second crossing was announced by my good friend and leader of the Scottish Liberal Democrats, Nicol Stephen. I thank Nicol for his tremendous support during the by-election. He is an excellent leader with all the drive, enthusiasm and intellect that one could hope for. However, Nicol is not the only leader who has connections with Kincardine. I am sure that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) will recall our meeting in the village café on polling day. Unlike now, he looked surprisingly optimistic.

The iconic Forth bridge connects my consistency with that of another Liberal Democrat, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (John Barrett). Hon. Members will know that the 1.5 mile-long bridge is the world's first major steel bridge. It has a balanced cantilever design, and its gigantic girder, with a span of more than 500 m, ranks as one of the great feats of civilization. From the top of the bridge—and I know—the views of the constituency are stunning. We are fortunate to have a rich diversity of attractions and entertainment. Fordell Firs is the national scout activity centre, and it is widely used by schools and youth groups as well. Just up the road is the Scottish base of the Mines Rescue Service, with an international reputation that we must support and protect. In Dunfermline itself, a new venture called Ceramic Experience brings out the creative potential of children from a very young age. In the north, Knockhill attracts bike and racing car enthusiasts from all over the country. Run by dedicated volunteers, the Scottish vintage bus museum is now acknowledged as a focal point for historic bus restoration.

My constituency has a rich athletic heritage, with three excellent clubs. Pitreavie, which is celebrating its 50th anniversary, is rightly proud of international athletes such as Linsey McDonald and Ian Mackie. Dunfermline and West Fife coach Jimmy Bryce has a long record of nurturing young talent, but perhaps his latest find, Gemma Nicol, could be the most promising. Finally, my own club, Carnegie Harriers, has some first-class road and hill runners, including young John Hargreaves from my own village of Kelty.

Dunfermline is proud to be a home for many important businesses. The Dunfermline building society retains its strong links with the city, which houses its headquarters. Although it has experienced significant decline, Rosyth dockyard is still a major employer, and I am determined to ensure that that remains the case for many years to come.

On the subject of employment, I am very disappointed with yesterday's decision to axe 142 jobs from D. M. Crombie, and I am seeking to meet the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence, the right hon. Member for East Kilbride, Strathaven and Lesmahagow (Mr. Ingram), to discuss the decision. Following the loss of hundreds of jobs at Lexmark and Simclar, I am determined to help those employees and to work toward bringing new high-value jobs to the constituency.

I can honestly say that Dunfermline and West Fife is a great constituency and one that I am honoured to represent. I can today pledge that I will serve all of my constituents—no matter on which side of the House they sit.

Many of my constituents will be interested to hear our debate on cancer services. It is particularly fitting that I make my maiden speech in this debate, as Rachel Squire had a long and brave battle against a brain tumour. I am sure that everyone in this House will have been affected by cancer in some way or another—a friend, family or even themselves. More than 130,000 people die from cancer in the UK every year. It is an illness that takes life in such a brutal manner.

This week, I was pleased to be able to sign early-day motion 1696 on action mesothelioma day. Members will know that mesothelioma is an incurable asbestos-related cancer. It can develop 30 or 40 years after a person has come into contact with asbestos, which was widely used in the shipbuilding industry until the late 1970s. Many people predict that the epidemic will peak in around 2020. Its dockyard and ship-breaking heritage makes my constituency a national hotspot for mesothelioma. As reported in last week's Dunfermline Press, Dr. Colin Selby, a chest specialist at the local hospital, has warned that between 200 and 300 men could die in West Fife from the condition each year. At the moment, many men have not even heard of it. I am therefore grateful to the Dunfermline Press and to the British Lung Foundation for helping to raise awareness of this crippling disease.

During my election I campaigned on four key issues. First, I led the effort against the proposed increases in tolls on the Forth road bridge. We need to provide public transport alternatives to the various parts of Lothian for our commuters who are currently forced to use their cars. I look forward to working with others on developing a sustainable transport strategy for this major artery.

Secondly, I said that I would work with local health campaigners on the future of our local hospital, the Queen Margaret. We need to explore how much major elective surgery can take place there. I would like a waiting times unit to be developed at the hospital to conduct hip replacements and the like. I am pleased to say that I have already met people from the hospital and the local health board to advance that agenda.

Thirdly, many local people feel frustrated about the state of our city centre. I have pledged to press all those responsible for a revitalised city centre of which we can all be proud.

Finally, despite the best efforts of teachers, standards in our primary schools are below the national average. Our secondary schools are too large. We need a new secondary school for the West Fife villages, and I want to help to reduce the size of our secondary schools overall.

My constituents have sent me to Westminster to represent their concerns and to fight for their interests. They have placed their trust in me and I will not let them down.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie) on his excellent maiden speech. As a new Member—I was elected only last year—I know how scary it can be to stand here and make a speech for the first time. He did it with some flair and I am sure that he will never forget the occasion. Having all his pals around him is no bad thing. It is also rather nice that they seem to be staying to listen to my speech. I thank them for that.

Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): I, too, welcome the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie). It is a pleasure to have him here, although it is obviously a pity that the Labour party candidate did not win. However, for me, as the last by-election victor, it will be a pleasure not to be known as, "Jim Devine, the new Labour MP for Livingston".

Mrs. Hodgson: I must continue with the happy tone by congratulating the Government on their fantastic record of investment in cancer services, especially the first cancer plan, which we have discussed. It was published in 2000—[Interruption.] I see that some of the Liberal Democrats are leaving now. The plan has meant that more funding than ever has been pumped into cancer services—an extra £280 million in 2001–02, increasing to £570 million in 2003–04. I do not have the most recent figure but I am sure that it is even higher.

I must also draw attention to our fantastic record on waiting times, which have been reduced to two weeks to be seen by a specialist, a month for diagnosis and two months for treatment. That cannot go without recognition in the debate.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife, as a new Member, will be asked in what he will specialise. I gave many answers to that question as the weeks went on. I had no idea in what I would specialise, although I had many interests and many important matters came my way. However, the decision was taken out of my hands when my best friend, Joanne Smith, was diagnosed with breast cancer at the age of 34. At the time, she had a two-year-old and a seven-year-old, who are now a little older—one has had a birthday since then—but she was a young woman with a young family. The diagnosis was a tragedy, which has totally coloured my first year as a Member of Parliament.

Joanne was seen within 48 hours by a cancer specialist at my local hospital, the Queen Elizabeth hospital. Her consultant, Dr. Clark, has been incredible and her treatment has been fantastic. She had a double mastectomy and a terrible course of chemotherapy, which debilitated her. Nobody goes through chemotherapy lightly, but because she was so young she had to have such a high dose that it was shocking to see her suffer through it.

I immediately began campaigning for herceptin and joined the all-party group that my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) mentioned earlier. I was keen to get my local cancer network—the northern cancer network—to reverse its decision not to prescribe herceptin. It made the decision because the drug did not have National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence guidance. However, after campaigns by me and other hon. Members throughout the country and the region, the decision was reversed. When I asked why the network had reversed it, it cited the comments by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that lack of NICE guidance should not be an excuse for not prescribing the drug and that it was up to individual PCTs.

The PCTs in my area recognise that they have the freedom to make such decisions, but they do not do that in practice because they defer to the northern cancer network. When one questions the northern cancer network, one finds that it defers to NICE guidance. So, although individual PCTs can make these decisions, in practice they do not.

Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): Is the hon. Lady aware that the "Herceptin for Shropshire" campaign was launched in the Shropshire County primary care trust area today, as my hon. Friend the Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Paterson) mentioned earlier? The campaign is being led by a number of ladies in similar circumstances to those of the hon. Lady's friend, who have a particular reason to secure that support. It is important that they should continue to press the PCT to secure the funding, because, as the Secretary of State has said, she is prepared to allow it to take place.

Mrs. Hodgson: I have some ideas on funding, and I want to open up a debate on that whole issue. I shall come to that in a moment. We just have to keep pressing the individual PCTs and reminding them that they have the ability to take these decisions, regardless of the budgetary pressures that they are under. We are pumping in lots of money for cancer services, and they must spend it wisely. However, I am told that they often choose to spend money that they had allocated for cancer services on other equally pressing things. It is up to everyone involved in this debate to insist that that money is spent on cancer treatment.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): The hon. Lady has touched on the issue of funding. Is she aware that many people who suspect that they might have cancer are having to go privately to get diagnostic scans, because their GPs are so hesitant to spend their money on scans? The GPs are telling them that they have to go down other routes, such as consulting nutritionists or osteopaths, rather than sending them directly for a scan diagnosis. I am told that, in my area, only 40 per cent. of such patients are referred for a scan by their GP, because of funding issues.

Mrs. Hodgson: The hon. Lady makes a good point, but time is short, so I must press on.

My campaign with my friend got a lot of press interest, and the northern cancer network reversed its decision, on which I congratulate it. My friend started her herceptin treatment two weeks ago. She is one of the first people in the region to receive it.

I want to talk briefly about brain tumours, which relates to the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife, whose predecessor, Rachel Squire, sadly died after suffering from a brain tumour. Some other famous people who have suffered from brain tumours are Bob Marley, Elizabeth Taylor, Mo Mowlam and Sir Stamford Raffles. Such tumours account for one death in every 100. Someone who is not as famous as those people is a constituent of mine who is quite dear to my heart. His name is Fred Fergus, and I have been campaigning on his behalf for access to the drug temozolomide, which is awaiting NICE's approval. We were told that that would be decided by the end of the year, but I recently received some information on an appraisal consultation document—an ACD—put out by NICE. Apparently, NICE is recommending that the therapy should not be provided on a subsidised basis on the NHS in England and Wales for patients with newly diagnosed, high-grade malignant brain tumours. Perhaps the Minister will tell the House why.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): My hon. Friend has been involved in two campaigns. I was involved in one in Redcar relating to a drug called alimta, which has been licensed but not NICE-ed, as it were. It is used to treat mesothelioma, which is a terminal illness. NICE was not even going to evaluate it until October 2007, but that was useless for the men suffering from the disease who had only months to live. However, NICE is now introducing a fast-track procedure. When the Minister responds to the debate, will she tell the House whether it is intended that all cancer drugs should go through that procedure?

Mrs. Hodgson: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for that intervention.

Mr. Fergus is receiving his radiotherapy on the NHS and paying privately for a prescription of temozolomide. He says that it has given him his life back. There has been such a change in him in terms of memory since he has had access to the drug. Obviously, brain tumours affect the brain and memory, but with this drug he can function so much better, which is why I am so concerned about NICE perhaps not approving it.

I want to move on to another very sad case involving a bowel cancer sufferer. Bowel cancer is responsible for 50 deaths a day in the UK, and it claimed the life of my constituent, Jack Wilson, at the age of 66. He was a retired miner who was hoping to get the drug cetuximab on the NHS. Again, he was told that the drug was not approved. I have already mentioned the northern cancer network and the process we go through there.

I am short of time, so I should say that I want an urgent review of the funding of cancer treatments. As the hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) said, there will be another drug, then another and another. More and more are on the horizon and we will have to try to fund them. Taxpayers are entitled to receive the best possible treatment and value for money from the NHS, so we need to examine how such treatments can be financed while retaining the tax base of the NHS and the principle that health care should be free at the point of need.

There is a specific problem with funding drug treatments—the hon. Gentleman also mentioned this—while they are licensed but before they are NICE approved. There is a strong case for a dedicated cancer charity that would fund specific cancer drugs during that interim period. Also, there should perhaps be a dedicated lottery card. I shall leave those thoughts with the Minister.

6.32 pm

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): First, I congratulate the new hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie), who said that this is a bewildering place initially. I must admit, as one who continues to consider himself a new Member, that it is bewildering still. I spoke to my Whip only a few minutes ago, and he bewildered me further. However, I understand that I have a few minutes to make some comments on the important matter of cancer, having already written off my career.

My predecessor, Sir Teddy Taylor, introduced an Adjournment debate in February 2002 on the subject of cancer care in south Essex, supported by my good friend and colleague my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) and by my hon. Friends the Members for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois), who spoke earlier on the issue that I want to raise: the size of the cancer networks.

Some three or four years ago, when my predecessor raised the issue, he was very concerned that cancer networks had to involve a population of more than 1 million. In south Essex, the population is only about 700,000 and we were to be merged with neighbouring areas. The cancer tsar, Mike Richards, came down, had a look and said that although we have a small population, the number of operations is large—indeed, as large, if not larger, than that of some cancer networks with more than 1 million people.

In addition, south Essex is quite densely populated, but does not have good traffic infrastructure. It would be particularly difficult for patients to get out of the existing south Essex area for care. Like many Members, I have close family who have experienced cancer: my grandmother in her later years had breast cancer and received excellent care from Macmillan Cancer Relief.

Mr. Greg Hands (Hammersmith and Fulham) (Con): On the subject of Macmillan Cancer Relief, does my hon. Friend share my concern that nursing specialists in the Hammersmith hospitals NHS trust have been threatened with a move to general ward work from specialist oncology and palliative care, and that one of the two Macmillan counsellors is under threat of redundancy? All of that is due to a large NHS deficit.

James Duddridge: I thank my hon. Friend for raising that point. I am horrified that that is the case—my grandmother received excellent care—and I believe that Macmillan Cancer Relief's head office is in his constituency.

It is important that south Essex keeps its cancer network. It is like "Groundhog Day" in that the Southend Echo, my local newspaper, ran a "hands off our cancer centre" campaign at the time when Sir Teddy Taylor raised the issue, and is now running a "save our cancer centre" campaign. The cancer network believes that it is the right size and does not believe that the cancer centre should be merged, although admittedly it has a number of other reasons. The consultation on the south Essex cancer care centre ends on 13 March, and I and several of my parliamentary neighbours will present quite a large petition signed by a number of constituents.

To my mind, it is bizarre that we are told locally that this is just a small, structural, management change, and that only a small number of people will be affected this time round—as few as 20 or 30. We are deeply concerned, however, that once we are merged into a larger area including Anglia, more intermediate care cancer services, as well as specialist care, will be moved further and further away. Increasingly, with bad transport infrastructure, that journey will be two hours plus. While that might be acceptable for a one-off appointment, it is not acceptable in cases of cancer with many repeat appointments.

South Essex also faces a problem with the number of consultations. The strategic health authority has assured me that it will consult again if some other cancer services are moved elsewhere within an expanded network. Consultations always seem to be short, however. My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh is co-ordinating a consultation on the police that has been rushed through. On health services alone, six consultation processes, which kicked off in December, will end in the next few weeks. There is a degree of consultation overload.

If the local cancer network wants to remain as it is, and if local people who have been either writing to the Southend Echo or signing our petitions at pharmacists and doctors' surgeries say overwhelmingly that they do not want a merger, with the long distances involved, will the Minister assure us that we will be able to say to the local strategic health authority that, having gone through the consultation, people overwhelmingly want the network to remain as it is? My grandmother was in Bristol, not Southend. Her quality of life was appalling in her final years, despite the services provided by Macmillan Cancer Relief, and I fear what her quality of life would have been if she had had to travel for two hours every day.

Despite problems with the local bus and train service, people in Southend can still get to Southend hospital relatively easily, and they would be grateful for an assurance that if all the parties in the consultation call for no change, there will be no change. Let us not go through all of this again in three years—when I hope that I will still be the MP—if the issue arises once more. My predecessor seemed to have dealt with it. Sadly, that is not the case. I seek the Minister's reassurance.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): First, let me associate myself and my right hon. and hon. Friends with the Secretary of State's generous remarks about Gregor MacKay, whose memorial event is taking place today. We all pay great tribute to the work that he did for us as a colleague, and indeed to his many friendships across the political divide. We pay equal tribute to Linda Smith. We have been debating a terrible disease that afflicts so many—that, indeed, afflicts almost everyone in the country, at least indirectly, in our minds. That applies particularly to someone who was so public, so much loved, and such a wonderful comedienne.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie) on an extremely good maiden speech. As the last Conservative by-election winner—some years ago—I am glad to be able to congratulate the most recent Liberal Democrat by-election winner. I met many of my future colleagues on the streets of my constituency: 200 Labour Members. As it happens, the debate in which I made my maiden speech was very well attended, although I hasten to say that that was nothing to do with me. At least 400 Members present who had worked their socks off to try to ensure that I did not arrive here had to listen to my speech. I therefore had considerable sympathy with the hon. Gentleman when he described his experience. I also thought that he spoke very movingly about the experience of stepping into the shoes of a much-respected Member, Rachel Squire, who sadly succumbed to the brain tumour that she had borne so bravely. That is particularly sad in the context of today's debate. In many respects it is a highly appropriate debate—and it is for another day for us to make any points about a Scottish Member seeking to involve himself in a debate that relates only to England.

Mr. Tom Harris (Glasgow, South) (Lab): Quit while you are ahead.

Mr. O'Brien: Given that the hon. Gentleman, who is the Secretary of State's Parliamentary Private Secretary, is the only other Scottish Member who has been present for most of the debate, it is a shame that he has made his presence felt from a sedentary position.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline and West Fife gave us a wonderful and engaging tour of his constituency. I am sure that his constituents look forward to his serving them with all his energy and enthusiasm. I fear that he will have to rely on the Official Report to ensure that his most notable and, I predict, his most challenging constituent, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who, for some reason, was not present for his speech—recognises what a marvellous new Member of Parliament he has.

I am glad that the Secretary of State congratulated the Opposition on making this vital subject a priority for their precious time. The debate has been characterised by the concern, care and expertise brought to it by all who have had an opportunity to speak on behalf of their constituents. I am aware that tributes in the House often sound ritual, but I know that I am joined by my right hon. and hon. Friends, and indeed by Members throughout the House, in thanking the countless people in the NHS and beyond it who work tirelessly for and with those affected by cancer.

My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) made an excellent and constructive opening speech. I could not help being rather amused by the Secretary of State's slight discomfort over having to take the politics out of the NHS, but we were serious about wanting to debate the future of cancer services as a high priority. We heard from many Members on both sides of the House. The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) talked about the possibility of securing much lower provider costs for the NHS. That is, of course, an important subject, but I was particularly interested in what he had to say about the herceptin issue. For the sake of brevity, I will give the source for everything that he said about it. It can be found in column 1062 of the 8 December edition of the Official Report, set out wonderfully by my hon. Friend the Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley). He is obviously grateful that it has been read into the record again.

In a celebration of a local investment to which he wished to draw attention, the right hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) mentioned tariffs that have recently been imposed in a most incompetent manner. I think he found it difficult to refrain from mentioning that. However, he rightly highlighted the uncertainty that that is causing and the quick resolution that is required to clarify the matter. He asked whether the serious deficit in the Oxford Radcliffe Hospitals NHS Trust should be spread among others. He seemed to be shifting the debate as well as shifting the deficit, rather than dealing with the fundamental issue, which is vital to so many of the issues that we face in the NHS.

The hon. Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson), the chairman of the all-party group on cancer, as ever gave us an enthusiastic tour d'horizon of leading-edge scientific progress in this country. He advanced a wonderful argument for the success of our competitiveness internationally, intellectually and scientifically and then suggested that we get rid of competition. That was an interesting circular argument, which all of us will enjoy pondering once the Official Report is out.

We heard movingly from my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), who gave his personal testimony, particularly in the light of the difficult and dreadful experience that his wife has been through. I was very pleased, as I am sure all hon. Members were on both sides of the House, to hear that she has been given a clean bill of health and continues to receive the follow-on treatment. He made the important point, which we have sought to emphasise, that it is to the benefit of patients and to the subject as a whole that we take great care not to make it deliberately a party political issue when we look at the opportunities to improve outcomes for cancer survival and treatment.

We also heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and Southend, East (James Duddridge). Apart from the slightly interesting start, when he called his Whip bewildering, which struck me as instant career death, he spoke powerfully and made a cogent case on behalf of himself and my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), for Castle Point (Bob Spink) and for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) about the cancer network, and what the appropriate size is for the South Essex cancer care centre, considering local conditions. I hope that people at both national and local decision-making levels have taken due account of that strong and well-made case.

We also heard from the hon. Member for Gateshead, East and Washington, West (Mrs. Hodgson)—that is certainly one of the most confusing constituency titles, with half of each city in it. She said that she spent some time deciding what to specialise in. I felt that she spoke sensitively about her experience as a result of the breast cancer of her friend. The House was helped by hearing of that experience.

Looking at the future, we have to be clear where things stand today. As my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay said in relation to cancer care services, the present situation is unacceptable. There has been investment and continuing improvements, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has confirmed that the trend was already well established before this Government took over nine years ago, but—here is the big but—after nine years, survival rates are still among the worst in Europe, and significant inequalities of outcome persist in the UK. According to the Public Accounts Committee report, those inequalities are widening, not narrowing.

As we have heard today, difficulties have arisen following the Government's efforts to focus targets on reducing waiting times—the front end of the patient pathway. That has led to neglect of later treatment. We face a serious issue: once a patient is on the pathway, the pipeline of time is extending. There is a serious issue in respect of how to deal with the problem involving radiographers.

It was interesting to note that the future of cancer services is threatened because of the NHS's ballooning deficits. Will the Minister answer the excellent question from the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and confirm that there is no diminution or delay regarding the announcement from the Minister of State, Department of Health, the hon. Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton), as recently as August last year of a £37.5 million bowel cancer screening programme, which was confirmed just 30 days ago? Will she confirm that it will be up and running in April with five centres, not just one, as is being hinted as part of the financial cuts?

In addition to issues such as waiting times, the size of the work force, the new requirements for benchmarking and the exchange of information—so that clinicians, who are best placed to make such judgments, can draw on the very best of existing practice—there is another big issue that we need to concentrate on. The Secretary of State has had some time in which to deal with the herceptin issue. On the question of the announcement that she made in October, even if she is arguing that she did not say that she would end the postcode lottery for early-stage breast cancer and that there was no change, therefore, in her Department's policy, one is still left with the following question. Why on earth did she make the statement that she made in October, unless it was made on the ground of cost?

We were determined to raise today on the Floor of the House the future of cancer care services, because it is a priority. Such services need not merely to be maintained: the trends need to be enhanced, given the debilitating effect that cancer has on so many people in this country. At the moment, the opportunities to enhance the services available are being missed.

The Minister of State, Department of Health (Jane Kennedy): This has been a very interesting and useful debate, which the hon. Member for Billericay (Mr. Baron) opened very disarmingly. It is much easier to respond to a straightforward political discussion across the Dispatch Box, but this has been a very thoughtful debate and, in the short time available, I shall try to respond in a way that reflects that fact, and to answer as many questions as I can.

The cancer plan is a 10-year national strategy of investment and reform, the purpose of which is to reorganise, standardise and rejuvenate cancer services. We are just past the halfway point in implementing it, and looking back—it is appropriate that we do so—I challenge anyone not to acknowledge the clear and impressive story of real improvement. The hon. Member for Northavon (Steve Webb) asked when the next cancer plan will come along. There have been three reviews of the current plan and we may or may not have a further one. I take his point about wanting early warning of when another cancer plan will be considered, but that is some way down the track.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State spoke of the importance of prevention, detection, treatment and care. I do not want to repeat what she said, other than to say that unprecedented investment in new and replacement equipment is helping to improve reliability and access to diagnosis and treatment. We are expanding the cancer work force—I will not repeat the figures, which are in the amendment—and there are more cancer specialists. New training programmes for specialties such as radiography and endoscopy are increasing capacity. Such investment is going hand in hand with reform. Specialist teams have been established across the country that bring together surgeons, radiologists, pathologists, nurse specialists and many others to deliver co-ordinated care to patients in hospitals.

That brings me to the Opposition's motion, and I have to say that I agree with a lot—indeed, almost all—of it. It is very much in keeping with the opening speech of the hon. Member for Billericay, but I disagree profoundly with the suggestion that we now need a different approach if we are to make further improvements in cancer services. It is appropriate that I deal with this issue specifically. We are close to being the world leader in developing the multidisciplinary approach that I have just described. All these advances are due largely to the cancer plan and to the work of Professor Mike Richards, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said.

The hon. Member for Billericay discussed at length how the guidance and appraisals of the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence should be enforceable, and a number of Members referred to Herceptin and the role of NICE. When I first came into post last summer, the question arose of the length of time that NICE is taking on this issue. We issued a written statement today outlining the exact process for herceptin, but we must remember that the licensing process—which is very important for this treatment and its application—and the NICE appraisal process are absolutely critical in allowing the health service to take proper decisions on how it uses its resources locally to provide the proper available medicines and treatments. We trust NICE, as an independent organisation, to make those appraisals and to assess the new treatments. It does so in a way that is very efficient and highly regarded throughout the world.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: Will the Minister give way?

Jane Kennedy: I hesitate to give way, as I am very pressed for time, and there is a lot that I must respond to. I must tell the House that I resist the call to give NICE more powers and to change how it works, especially before it has had the opportunity to go through the appraisal process.

I very much welcomed NICE's willingness to embrace a new, single-technology appraisal process, especially given the strong defence made for its solid work in the past. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) asked whether that meant that all new cancer drugs will be subjected to the new, single-technology appraisal process. My quick answer is no: some new drugs will be taken alongside other treatments and medicines, and their numbers mean that they will have to go through the slightly longer process.

However, the process is critical for a drug such as Herceptin, which has serious side-effects. Quite rightly, the NHS needs the best possible advice that it can get in respect of such medicines.

Mr. Baron: I do not disagree with much of what the Minister says, but the bottom line is that the postcode lottery will still apply if the system continues to be run as it is at present. Cost assessments running alongside the appraisals would ensure that what was recommended could be afforded. That is what happens north of the border, for example, but the postcode lottery will continue to operate in the absence of such assessments

Jane Kennedy: The so-called postcode lottery applies only in the period when we are waiting for a treatment to be licensed. Once NICE approval has been given, the NHS has 90 days—three months—to make arrangements for provision of the medicine. I shall look in detail at the example to which the hon. Gentleman has drawn my attention, and see what can be done.

The hon. Member for Billericay mentioned the length of time that people have to wait for radiotherapy. He made far too many points for me to answer in the time remaining, but I can tell the House that the Royal College of Radiologists published an audit on 23 February that showed that the situation is improving. However, I accept the criticisms that have been made, and much remains to be done in this regard.

[Jane Kennedy]

Even so, I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the Department of Health has exceeded its target of recruiting an extra 1,000 radiographers. More than 1,400 additional radiographers and radiography assistants are now working in the NHS, compared with 2003. That is still not enough: a lot of progress has been made, but we recognise that more remains to be done.

The hon. Member for Northavon raised a number of points, and asked about the cost of herceptin. He will be interested to know that the new pharmaceutical price regulation scheme agreement that started in January 2005 will save the NHS more than £1.8 billion on branded prescription medicines over a five-year period. The detail of his question concerned whether the company Roche was offering anything at the moment. Although I cannot comment on that, it is an interesting thought, and I shall be happy to write to him about the matter. Many hon. Members said that the process was arbitrary, but in the long run I do not believe that tinkering with what happens before NICE gets involved will benefit the NHS in any way.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) works tirelessly for his constituents. As he said, quite rightly, he holds the health staff in his town in very high esteem, and I want to answer a couple of the specific points that he raised. He asked whether the tariff applied to cancer services. Under the payment by results programme, hospitals are paid according to the number and complexity of the cases treated. Chemotherapy, radiotherapy and, indeed, palliative care will eventually be included, but they are not included at present, and are treated as specialist services for the purpose of commissioning. I would be happy to talk to my right hon. Friend about the deficits that he described in Oxford on another occasion.

The hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) tempted me to be party political, but I shall just echo the words that have been said about his wife and the fact that she has made a full recovery. I am also pleased to hear that her personal experience of the service provided by the health service was good. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson)—

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question, That the Question be now put, put and agreed to.

Question put accordingly, That the original words stand part of the Question:—

The House divided: Ayes 228, Noes 294.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House recognises that the Government has made the improvement of cancer services a key priority through the implementation of the NHS Cancer Plan which sets out to reorganise and rejuvenate cancer services and has provided the NHS with investment to modernise these services; welcomes the achievements set out in the recent Public Accounts Committee report, the NHS Cancer Plan: a progress report, which acknowledged that significant progress has been made across the country; notes that the total death rate for cancer in people under 75 has fallen by 14 per cent. since 1996; acknowledges that under this Government unprecedented investment in equipment is helping to improve both access to, and reliability of, diagnosis and treatment; further notes that specialist teams have been established across the country to help deliver co-ordinated care to patients in hospitals; further welcomes the fact that the National Institute for Health and Clinical Excellence is introducing a new fast track assessment process to enable them to issue binding advice to the NHS on the most important new drugs within weeks of them receiving a licence; further notes that this Government has commissioned research to enable initiatives to raise awareness of the symptoms of cancer to be targeted on people most at risk; further notes that there has been a 43 per cent. increase in cancer consultants since 1997; acknowledges that there has been a 40 per cent. increase in cancers detected through breast screening; and further welcomes the Government's commitment to continuing to deliver the commitments in the NHS Cancer Plan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. If Members are leaving the Chamber, they should do so quietly and, hopefully, in ones or twos, rather than like a football crowd. That will allow us to get on with the next items of business.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I propose to put together the Questions on motions 3 to 5.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE

That the draft Representation of the People (England and Wales) (Amendment) Regulations 2006, which were laid before this House on 24th January, be approved.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW

That the draft National Assembly for Wales (Representation of the People) (Amendment) Order 2006, which was laid before this House on 24th January, be approved.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND)

That the draft Representation of the People (Scotland) (Amendment) Regulations 2006, which were laid before this House on 6th February, be approved.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Question agreed to.

PETITIONS

Breast-feeding

7.17 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I am pleased to support an organisation called The Way Nature Intended in presenting to Parliament a petition signed by just over 1,000 people and collected by breast-feeding support groups around the country to support a change to legislation to make it illegal to discriminate against mothers because of how they decide to feed their babies. There are several thousand more signatures to the same petition online, but Parliament currently does not accept web-based petitions.

The petition states:

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Secretary of State for Health to take such measures as lie within her power to tackle any discrimination that prevents parents from feeding their babies at appropriate times in public places.

And the Petitioners remain etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill

7.19 pm

David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion) (Lab/Co-op): The petition is from the Brighton and Hove Chinese Society and has 92 signatures.

The petition

Declares that the Petitioners object to the new 'Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill' and the five year strategy for 'asylum and immigration, Controlling our borders: Making migration work for Britain'. The petitioners strongly believe that eliminating the applicant's right to appeal is against our human rights and is a very unfair act.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to amend three areas of the new Bill, which are:

1. The removal of in country appeal rights and removal of entry clearance appeal rights
2. Employer's duties in relation to their workers
3. The new points system affecting settlement rights

To lie upon the Table.

Planning Application (Canvey Island)

7.20 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): The trend in the south-east now seems to be for blocks of flats to be shoehorned into very small places. That has a number of consequences: it maximises developers' profits and it suits the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, which is trying to cram more houses into the south-east, but it has negative consequences for local communities, particularly as it places great stress on their infrastructure. This petition relates to such a case, and I pay tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Archer and Paul Bailey, who organised it, and to all who signed it.

The petition states:

To the House of Commons

The Petition of the residents of Canvey Island and others,

Declares that the petitioners are deeply concerned about the application to build 12 flats at the corner of Somnes Avenue and Maple Avenue on Canvey Island because the area is already overdeveloped for the infrastructure that exists and these flats would be served with totally insufficient car parking spaces and by Leige Avenue access road that is entirely inadequate and this would cause great disruption and inconvenience to all residents and create a major traffic accident area.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons call upon the Government to urge Castle Point Borough Councillors to reject this application.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Local Press Ownership

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Before I call the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), I just say to the Minister and the House that the hon. Gentleman is seriously incapacitated and is being given special dispensation to remain seated while he addresses the House this evening.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am most grateful for that permission to remain seated for entirely non-alcoholic reasons. I hope that it will not inhibit the ability of other Members to stand and applaud, as usual, during a speech on the Adjournment.

I declare an interest, first, in that I am a member of the National Union of Journalists. Secondly, I, too, have been fired by the Yorkshire Post for, I assume, economic reasons; it could not have been because of the quality of the articles that I was writing. Thirdly, I am chair of the parliamentary NUJ group. The situation has slightly changed since I requested the debate, which is basically about job cuts in regional and provincial newspapers. The Daily Mail and General Trust's proposal to sell off Northcliffe Press, which has 113 titles, including the Grimsby Telegraph and the Scunthorpe Telegraph, has now been postponed pro tem.

I wonder whether that is because I wrote to Lord Rothermere personally to advise him against the move. Although I do not like Northcliffe's politics in any way, it is one of the better organised groups and it has always been more concerned with quality, journalistic standards, training and the appointment of good editors—certainly at the Grimsby Telegraph—within the group. Grimsby has always had a good quality local evening paper, so I did not want the young Lord Rothermere to be misled by City slickers advising, as they usually do because of the fees that they get, "Sell and acquire," or by the conmen who often cluster round powerful figures advising them to invest in new technology such as the dotcom bubble of a few years back and abandon what they are doing well. I was delighted that although Lord Rothermere's reply did not exactly say, "My God, Mitchell, you are quite right. Why didn't I think of that? Would you like a directorship?", the plans have been slightly postponed, and I hope that that will give us the power to fight another day in this matter.

As an illustration of what is going on in the local press because of the preparations for the sale, Northcliffe's strategy involved a programme of redundancies and job losses. As the term goes, there was a "feeding down" of local newspapers to make them more profitable before selling them. The programme was called "Aim Higher", which journalists, with their usual cynicism, promptly called "Aim Fire". That involved getting rid of substantial numbers of journalists throughout the country to make the group more saleable.

That process has been repeated in every newspaper group throughout the country. These days, provincial newspapers are basically in chains. They are born free, but everywhere they are in chains, and the chains are looking to profitability. Trinity Mirror has 230 titles. Last year, it made a profit of £172 million. It is proposing hundreds of redundancies. Newsquest was £700 million in profit last year. It has 216 titles. It has already fired 25 subs in Colchester and between 60 and 70 in Scotland. Johnston had a profit of £177 million last year. It has 283 titles. It has just closed its press in Scarborough. Archant made a profit of £332 million out of 80 titles and is firing 17 subs in Norfolk. Even The Guardian is going through this process. There will be hundreds, if not more than 1,000, job losses in provincial newspapers.

This is being done at a time when the provincial press is profitable. It is said that it is being done because other advertising media—internet websites—will take revenue from other forms of profitable classified advertising, which provides about 50 per cent. of the revenue of local newspapers. If that were the motive, newspapers could always buy up the competition, as they bought up the free sheets. At present, regional newspapers are very profitable and becoming more profitable year on year. Profit margins are between 20 and 35 per cent. Those margins are higher than any margins in the local press in France, Germany, Europe generally and the United States. Advertising spending is increasing in local newspapers by 5.8 per cent. a year, and has increased every year for 13 years.

It is not the fact that these newspapers are unprofitable and are thus subject to job losses. They are local monopolies that do not face competition, which would enforce higher spending, so they are able to reduce the numbers of journalists and to cut spending on staff generally. The other factor to take into account is the growing power of the newspaper chains that want to increase the rate of return that they pay to their shareholders. In fact, that is the main explanation for what is going on.

The consequences of those job losses fall on the quality of the newspapers. Despite what some directors and, particularly, accountants seem to think, journalists do need newspapers, and newspapers need journalists. Newspapers cannot be produced without journalists. Cut the journalism and all else fails. That is a failure from which we all suffer, as does local democracy. There is less coverage of council meetings, less coverage of the courts and less coverage of all local bodies. There is less coverage of the arguments over, for example, academy schools. There is less discussion and less analysis of what is going on locally.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op):The Leicester Mercury is a Northcliffe newspaper, and an excellent one. One of the subjects that my hon. Friend has described is creeping out of its coverage—local issues at sub-county level are getting much less coverage, not least because such newspapers are in slow-managed circulation decline. Therefore, advertising is providing a higher proportion of income.

Mr. Mitchell: That is going on throughout the country. It weakens local democracy and local newspapers. It also weakens local interest. There is less analysis of what we are doing. There is less discussion of politics; less discussion of what the local council is doing; and less discussion of what senior local figures do at local power centres.

If one does not have the journalists on the required scale, fewer journalists cover stories. They do not go out—they stay in the office to cobble together press releases using the glossy spin that companies and institutions produce to say that they are doing well when, in fact, they are not. Those companies are concealing the truth, and the journalists conspire in that concealment. There are fewer specialists, including health specialists and even sports specialists. Spin wins—the truth does not prevail—and, as a result, the electorate is less well-informed.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am sure that in preparation for this debate my hon. Friend has read the Forest of Dean and Wye Valley Review, which usefully explains what is happening in my part of the world. The Citizen has been moved to Gloucestershire Echo territory which, as anyone who knows Gloucestershire will realise, is like revisiting the civil war. The Western Daily Press and the Evening Post are fine newspapers, but they have been pushed together. Journalists have been threatened with the sack, sub-editors have been removed and so on. Does my hon. Friend agree that that is not acceptable?

Mr. Mitchell: I would give my hon. Friend a standing ovation if I were capable of standing to applaud him. It is a weakening of local influence and local information. It is a weakening of democratic debate in the localities at a time when we are desperately trying to strengthen local democracy and transfer power from London to the regions. There is talk of the new localism, communes and new local leadership groups, but local democratic debate will be harmed by the cutting of newspaper staff and reporters.

John McDonnell (Hayes and Harlington) (Lab): In view of the success of my hon. Friend's correspondence with Lord Rothermere, may I invite him to write to the Hillingdon & Uxbridge Times, which is putting to the knife a number of journalistic and other jobs in my local area? That, too, will lead to the creation of a near-monopoly as one paper folds and another does not. Is not the true problem the fact that profitability is so high that obscene wage awards are given to chief executives? The chief executive of the Trinity Mirror group, Ms Sly Bailey, has slashed jobs in the past few months but earns a salary of £550,000 and gave herself a bonus of £495,000 this year.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree that that is obscene, and it produces lethargy in the local press when we want dynamism, drive and competition. There can be no healthy local democracy without a healthy local media, particularly healthy, efficient and effective local papers staffed by good journalists who develop stories and provide information for people to make democratic decisions. The people suffer, and we suffer, because we cannot communicate our views and policies to the electorate. We cannot make the case for the kind of society that we want to achieve. Newspapers can always be sold if they are filled with sex, celebrities, the more interesting bits of Abi Titmuss and extruded pap in place of news. However, one cannot educate or inform the people on that basis, as one is peddling lies, which are blandished as spin in place of honest information, inquiry and serious analysis. One cannot build a healthy local democracy on that basis.

The Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Sutcliffe), has the invidious job of responding to my tirade—his Department is the only one with any regulatory power in this field—and I hope that he accepts the need to look at the issue of profiteering by local monopolies. I hope that he will consider trying to give newspapers a different status in takeovers, and will try to restrict the growing power of the chains, which are attempting to push up profits. I hope that he will investigate with the Department for Culture, Media and Sport how we can encourage and increase diversity in our local newspapers and media, because that is the only healthy way to encourage local democracy.

Localism is becoming extinct and centralisation is growing. High streets are dying, post offices are closing, and the whole world has been taken over by massive supermarkets. We need to bring democracy back to our people, and we can do that only with the help of the local media.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on securing this debate on a subject that is very close to his heart following his years in journalism and the media. I am happy that he had special dispensation this evening to remain in a sedentary position because of the recurrence of his old injury from a parachute jump 30 years ago. That shows how adventurous he can be. As he said, he is a member of the National Union of Journalists and chair of the NUJ group here in Parliament, which plays a positive role in trying to ensure that the news gets told as it should, not only in local journalism but in the national media. Unfortunately, that is not always the case.

My hon. Friend focused on the role of provincial newspapers. I speak with some practical experience of that world. In my younger days, I worked for our local newspaper, the Bradford Telegraph and Argus, as a display advertising clerk. My role was to go up to the editor and explain how much space he had left for news, because the advertising revenue was important to the paper. Later on, I was a full-time trade union officer in the printing industry with the SOGAT union, so I am aware of the importance of local media to jobs in our communities. My hon. Friend is right to point to the importance of our having a healthy provincial newspaper sector.

When this debate was announced, many hon. Members asked me to mention their newspapers, but there were so many that it would be impossible to do so. I therefore generalise by saying that the Grimsby Telegraph and the Scunthorpe Telegraph are important, as are the Hull Daily Mail and the Bradford Telegraph and Argus. I am sure that the others are as well.

My hon. Friend talked about what happens when groups of newspapers come together and how that affects the quality of the journalism. I do not entirely share his sense of doom and gloom about that. Many local newspapers are finding innovative ways of communicating with their local communities. They have the basic product of the newspaper but are using other media to try to get the message across. The advantage that many local newspapers have is that they are a strong brand within their communities and are trusted on issues to do with local education, local government and so on. The brand name of a local newspaper, which has often been in the community for a long time, brings with it the view that it is caring for the community that it serves.

The local press is a competitive world because of the diversification of the media that is taking place. It is important that newspapers try to find new, imaginative ways of reaching the public, whether through free newspapers or other media with which they can get involved. The Government are mindful of the importance of the media, particularly local media.

The laws relating to local press ownership are found in the Broadcasting Act 1996, the Enterprise Act 2002 and the Communications Act 2003. Newspaper ownership, including local newspaper ownership, is regulated by rules under the Enterprise Act, as amended by the Communications Act. Cross-media ownership is regulated by the Broadcasting Act, again amended by the Communications Act. The ownership rules aim to avoid undue concentration of media ownership and to maintain diverse media content from a variety of sources. The Communications Act replaced the special merger regime for newspaper transfers under sections 57 to 62 of the Fair Trading Act 1973 with a simpler and more relaxed system.

The Communications Act sought to deregulate when possible to promote competition and attract new investment. The Act removed the requirement for the Government to be pre-notified of all newspaper mergers. It also removed the requirement for the Secretary of State to make a decision only following a report from the Competition Commission. That was expected to generate cost savings for business and the Department of Trade and Industry. The Department previously charged a fee of £5,000 or £10,000, depending on the circulation, for considering the merger. A reference to the Competition Commission entailed an average cost of £300,000 and imposed extra costs on businesses.

The more streamlined and less burdensome regime meant that the regulatory resources could be better focused on the transfers of newspapers that raise competition or plurality concerns. The new regime was aligned with the new system for general mergers that the Enterprise Act introduced.

The Communications Act added new newspaper public interest considerations to the Enterprise Act, thereby enabling the Secretary of State to intervene in a case and, if necessary, to refer it to the Competition Commission when it raised concerns about the accurate presentation of news, the free expression of opinion or the plurality of views in newspapers in the UK or part of the UK.

The main media ownership provisions of the Communications Act that related to newspapers were, at national level, the retention of existing limits on joint ownership of newspapers and Channel 3. At regional level, a parallel 20 per cent. rule was retained. No one who owns a regional Channel 3 licence may own more than 20 per cent. of the local regional newspaper market.

The rules that apply to joint ownership of national newspapers and Channel 5 were removed. Locally, a limit was retained on the ownership of local radio stations by companies that control more than 50 per cent. of the newspaper market in the area of the radio service in question and companies that own a regional Channel 3 licence, whose coverage is, to a significant extent, the same as that of the radio service. Restrictions on radio ownership by newspaper companies with less than a 50 per cent. share were removed.

I hope that my hon. Friend will recognise that the Government are concerned about those relationships and that we acknowledge the importance of local newspapers in their communities. We are also concerned about the impact on the quality of journalism.

Like all hon. Members, I know from personal experience that many journalists who work on local newspapers do not stay for a long time—there is a high turnover of journalists in the local media. In some cases, that is due to promotions. In Westminster, there are many examples of Lobby journalists who come from local newspapers. The NUJ is especially concerned about the quality of young people who are attracted to the profession and ensuring that they have long and worthwhile careers.

I note my hon. Friend's success with Lord Rothermere. I am sure that that is down to his personal performance in writing to Lord Rothermere and his distinguished career. I emphasise that we are keeping an eye on what is happening. The regulatory regime is in place if there are problems and we are always happy to hear from the NUJ and other bodies about their concerns about the quality of journalism.

My hon. Friend is right to raise the subject and to ensure that we are all mindful of the quality that we receive from the local media. I hope that he will accept that we are prepared to consider the matter and to meet regularly to ascertain why there are problems.

John McDonnell: As secretary of the NUJ parliamentary group, I invite the Minister to meet us, when we would welcome the opportunity for him to meet delegations of some of the trade unionists from individual newspapers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) said, the calculation is that 1,000 job losses have occurred in the sector in the past six months. It is an important sector and the scale of job losses is significant. We would welcome the opportunity for the Minister to experience at first hand the impact on people's employment.

Mr. Sutcliffe: That is a reasonable request, and I will be happy to do that for my hon. Friend. We will make arrangements, following this debate, to have such a meeting.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): I thank the Minister for giving way, and I am sorry that I missed the first three minutes of the debate. When he meets the group, will he try to make it an all-party group? There is concern on both sides of the House about this matter.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I recognise that point. I do not think that there is a party political nature to this debate. We are all aware of the impact of the local media on our communities. I should be happy for the meeting to involve Members from all parties, but it will be up to the members of the group to decide whom they invite for me to meet.

This is an important debate, and there are many issues relating to diversification in the media. The printed media in particular face many challenges.

David Taylor: I am sure that the Minister will accept that the concerns about the Rothermere press that my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby and others have raised this evening are not politically motivated. Its regional papers are scrupulously fair and balanced, not only in election periods but throughout the electoral cycle. At least, that is my experience in Leicestershire. We are making general and genuine principled points, not political ones.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I accept that, and I am not trying to denigrate any of the points that have been made. They have been well made, from the honest position of wanting to ensure that good quality journalism in our communities continues, and that the well-being of local newspapers continues. I am trying to explain that, within our enterprise and competition regime, we have the opportunity to deal with certain situations if we feel that they are not benefiting local areas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby talked about buying from supermarkets rather than newsagents. The world is changing, in regard to the ways in which consumers acquire their information, whether it be through the printed media, radio, television or the internet. There is a whole variety of ways for news to reach us. This has been a worthwhile debate, and I hope that it will have positive consequences at our meeting. I also hope that the House accepts the position that I have put forward.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Millennium Development Goals

1. Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with international Finance Ministers on financing the millennium development goals. [55117]

3. Ms Angela C. Smith (Sheffield, Hillsborough) (Lab): What assessment he has made of the role of an international finance facility in achieving the millennium development goals. [55119]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Next month, the international finance facility will start issuing its first bonds, supported by the United Kingdom and five other countries. We expect more countries to announce support next week. It will be a truly global facility, which will release an additional $4 billion to save 5 million lives between now and 2015. On Tuesday, France and Britain agreed a working group to push ahead with the full international finance facility to support health and education. We have invited other countries to join, and that is one way in which we can meet the millennium goals.

Mr. Joyce: My right hon. Friend has helped to ensure that the United Kingdom is the largest funder of the election preparations that are under way in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, which the all-party group on the great lakes plans to visit in a couple of weeks. Does he agree that a responsible approach by all parties in that country is fundamental to ensuring that it can progress properly towards its development goals after the election?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I know that he takes a great interest in matters in the Congo and I wish the delegation well when it visits that country soon. We are in a position to give additional support to it and other conflict-ridden countries as they prepare for the future. The purpose of the international finance facility is to front-load finance and make it possible to achieve the millennium development goals by 2015. That applies especially to areas where there is high infant mortality. Of the 130 million children born each year, only 30 million are vaccinated. We need to do something about that.

Ms Smith: What contribution does my right hon. Friend believe that the international finance facility makes to ensuring environmental sustainability, which is one of the millennium development goals? Last week, I visited a secondary school where year 7 and year 9 children pressed on me the importance of development and climate change issues. Of course—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The question is sufficient.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for asking about development and the importance of the environment to it. Having met environmental groups this week—[ HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"]—as I have met them almost every month for the past few years, I see a huge interest in considering environmental and development questions together. [Interruption.] It is interesting that not one Tory seeks to ask a question on that important matter.

We are pressing the World Bank to introduce a new facility, similar to an international finance facility, for loans and grants for alternative sources of energy to be developed by developing countries and emerging market countries so that greater energy efficiency can be achieved there. We are already doing for the environment—for alternative sources of energy and energy efficiency in developing countries—what we do for health and education. I would have thought that there was all-party support for that.

Cash Machines

2. Mary Creagh (Wakefield) (Lab): What steps he is taking to promote access to free cash machines. [55118]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): As we set out in our response to the Treasury Committee's recent report, the Government believe that access to cash is important. Although 96 per cent. of cash machine withdrawals are made from free machines, we know that many hon. Members have serious concerns. The Government would be especially worried if people on low incomes incurred a disproportionate cost in accessing their money.

Mary Creagh: The Economic Secretary is doubtless aware that British consumers will pay £250 million in charges to access their money this year. What steps is he taking to prevent banks from further selling off their cash machines and to ensure free cash machines in public places such as hospitals, railway stations and colleges? Wakefield college in my constituency charges students £1.85 to withdraw their own money.

Mr. Lewis: I understand my hon. Friend's concerns. In the past five or six years, as a result of the work of the Treasury Select Committee and the Treasury, there has been an improvement. However, there are continuing concerns about the danger that the position may deteriorate. That is why, in a recent debate, I said that I would facilitate a meeting in the next few weeks between representatives of the Select Committee, the industry and the financial inclusion taskforce to ensure that we do not go backwards on such an important public policy issue.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): I thank the Economic Secretary for his generous gesture in holding that meeting. Before that, two issues need to be considered: first, sharing postcodes in areas where there is concentrated financial inclusion or exclusion, and secondly, transparency. Approaching cash machines should be akin to going to a petrol station, where the customer knows what he or she is getting into. Knowing that is imperative.

Mr. Lewis: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend, and pay tribute to the work that he has done on this issue. He is right to say that we should be concerned if there were evidence that paying for cash was more prevalent in areas with low-income families and financial exclusion. However, we cannot make a judgment about that unless we are able to collect the appropriate evidence, so it is important that we do that as part of the process. On transparency, I agree entirely with him. It is perfectly reasonable that, when consumers go to cash points, the nature of any charges should be made absolutely clear.

Stewart Hosie (Dundee, East) (SNP): Is the Minister not concerned that some of the changes mooted in the ongoing consultation on the arrangements for Scottish banknotes—involving changes to the till level, the fiduciary level and seniorage—might put additional pressure on the free-to-use cash machines in Scotland?

Mr. Lewis: That is nonsense. The scare stories that the Scottish National party has put about on the proposed changes to Scottish banknotes simply do not stack up in relation to the facts. That should not surprise us about the SNP. We are going to consult further on any changes, to assuage any concerns, but the SNP scare stories are simply untrue.

Gershon Review

4. Mr. David Burrowes (Enfield, Southgate) (Con): If he will make a statement on progress on the implementation of the Gershon review of public sector efficiency. [55120]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): The Government are on track to meet the Gershon efficiency targets. The pre-Budget report of 2005 announced a total of £4.7 billion in efficiency gains as at the end of September 2005, with 31,000 head-count reductions and more than 6,000 relocations. This is part of our long-term commitment to improving value for money in public services. Indeed, the National Audit Office agreed, in its recent report, that we were making good progress in that regard.

Mr. Burrowes: With reference to the National Audit Office report, is the lack of clearly measurable efficiency gains a problem of deficient management information systems or of a lack of will to bring about deeper and more systemic changes, or both?

Mr. Browne: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman has had the opportunity to read the National Audit Office report, of which I have a copy here. I will give him this copy if he has not had the opportunity to read all of it. I say that because I have recently had to debate this report with people who manifestly have not read it. The National Audit Office report was summarised by the Comptroller and Auditor General, Sir John Bourn, in the following terms in his press release:

> "There are many worthwhile activities going on within the efficiency programme and ... good progress is clearly being made."

We are now 10 months into the delivery of this process, and of course there are challenges in regard to the technical measurements involved. However, those challenges are being met in partnership with the National Audit Office and the Audit Commission. As the report makes clear, the measurement issues are being addressed and resolved.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Does the Chief Secretary accept that one important way to make efficiency gains is for central Government to have a more strategic, slimmed-down role, with resources devolved to local level, so that local solutions can be found for local problems?

Mr. Browne: Absolutely—[Interruption.] Let me just make the point that, in the whole of my public and political life, I have been arguing for and supporting devolution. Certainly, no Back Bencher needs to persuade me of its importance, or of what it has delivered for Scotland. The most important thing for my hon. Friend and his constituents is not only that decisions are made at the appropriate level—and some of them ought to be devolved—but that we devolve jobs out of the south-east. Part of the process of the efficiency agenda involves moving jobs from London and the south-east to the regions of England, Scotland and elsewhere, and we have been successful in doing so.

Greg Clark (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): In the Chancellor's last Budget, three weeks before the last general election, he claimed £2 billion worth of Gershon efficiency savings. On Monday, the National Audit Office will tell the Public Accounts Committee that it can find no evidence for half those savings. Will the Minister make a commitment, on behalf of the Chancellor, that, in the forthcoming Budget, he will use no figures claiming Gershon savings unless they have been signed off as above board by the NAO first?

Mr. Browne: The hon. Gentleman would also benefit from reading the National Audit Office report. It confirms that significant progress is being made, and says—particularly in relation to the Department for Work and Pensions, which accounts for a significant portion of the head count—that the published figures are "robust". It deals with exactly the issue that the hon.

Gentleman has raised. We have not yet reached the end of the first year, but we have a transparent system. We have published the technical notes and the basis of measurement, and we have worked with the National Audit Office and the Audit Commission on the measurement.

As I have said, in our view the report published last week confirms that our figures are robust; and where they are not robust, we are dealing with the measurement issues. We will continue to report, in a transparent fashion, to Parliament and the country on the progress that we are making on this important matter.

Mrs. Theresa Villiers (Chipping Barnet) (Con): In 2004, the Chancellor promised a reduction of 70,600 in the number of civil service posts by 2008. Most people would understand that to mean that in 2008, 70,600 fewer people will be working for the civil service than when the Chancellor made that promise. Will that be the case, or will the Treasury permit Departments to include head count reduction in full towards their Gershon targets despite additional recruitment for new projects? That would mean, paradoxically, that we could end up with more people working for the civil service in 2008 rather than 70,000 fewer—and I am not even taking into account the issue of civil servants being laid off and rehired as consultants. Have not the Government set the Gershon goalposts in such a way that they can claim savings without making real improvements to embed a culture of efficiency and value for money in our delivery of public services?

Mr. Browne: The hon. Lady has made the same error in comparing statistics that she made when we debated the issue on the "Today" programme. I say to her now, as I said to her then, that page 29 of the report deals with it in some detail, and explains why comparing different data is inappropriate.

Let me deal directly with the question of the number of civil servants. The hon. Lady relies for her argument on the fact that during the period of measurement the magistrates courts were transferred from local government to central Government. With that decision came 12,000 people, whom the Office for National Statistics redesignated as civil servants. It is not a case of more people working in the magistrates courts; those people were redesignated. However, the National Audit Office report confirms the opposite of what the hon. Lady has argued—that, in bald civil service number terms, there was a significant reduction over the period. We will meet the target as it was set out in the Gershon review, and we will maintain our approach to meeting that target.

Pensioner Households

5. Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): What policies his Department has in place to improve the income of pensioner households. [55121]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): As a Labour Government, we have given pensioners pension credit, winter fuel payments, extra help with council tax, free prescriptions, free eye tests, free local-area bus travel and, for the over-75s, free television licences. All those measures have, directly or indirectly, increased pensioner household incomes, and all of them were opposed or criticised by the Conservatives at the time of their introduction.

Jim Dobbin: The Chancellor has indeed done much to eradicate pensioner poverty with such measures as free off-peak bus travel. The Greater Manchester passenger transport authority provides free travel on trains and trams after 9.30 am. Will the Minister encourage other PTAs to follow Manchester's example, and even to consider cross-county agreements with the aim of giving free travel to pensioners and disabled people in particular throughout the country?

John Healey: I am glad that my hon. Friend welcomes the fact that, in his constituency and throughout Greater Manchester, half a million people will benefit from the beginning of next month. It is true that some bus journeys from the Greater Manchester area will be free. It is also true that local authorities and passenger transport executives will retain the ability to arrange concessionary travel beyond their areas. We would certainly encourage them to do so, and I am sure that the Greater Manchester passenger transport executive is considering such action.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): I acknowledge that genuine measures have been taken to increase the prosperity of pensioners throughout the United Kingdom, but does the Minister accept that the widespread and growing use of means-testing acts as a major deterrent, discouraging low-income pensioner households in particular from claiming benefits?

John Healey: The Government are spending around £7 billion more on pensioners this year than we would be if we had restored the link to the rise in earnings. In a situation where almost one in five people are retiring on more than £400 a week, it is surely right that we put in place help for all pensioners. Clearly, the basic state pension remains the cornerstone for that, but it is right that we put in more help for the pensioners who need it most.

Edward Miliband (Doncaster, North) (Lab): Is my hon. Friend aware that in the seven years since 1997—[Hon. Members: "Nine years."]—the poorest fifth of single pensioners have seen their incomes rise by more than in all the years between 1979 and 1997? Is he further aware that the reason for that is the pension credit, and will he ensure that, in the years ahead, we build on those gains?

John Healey: I thank my hon. Friend for that question and for the statistics that he has supplied the House. He is right about the progress that has been made, and he is right to urge the Government to do more. Since 1997, 2 million pensioners have been lifted out of poverty by the measures that we have put in place. When we combine the personal tax and benefit changes made since 1997, this year, the average pensioner household will be £26 a week better off and the poorest 10 per cent. of pensioners will be £42 a week better off than they would have been under the Conservative system.

Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): The Minister is avoiding the question. How can he possibly justify a system that, through means-testing, means that it is possible for someone who has saved prudently for their retirement to be worse off than someone who is entitled to means-tested benefits?

John Healey: The hon. Gentleman needs to study the operation of the pension credit. For the first time, we have a system in place that gives extra help to the poorest pensioners but also gives an extra reward for those who put a bit by for their retirement, either through savings or modest personal or occupational pensions. It is high time that he and his party accept and welcome the operation of the pension credit and see it as something to build on further.

Lisbon Agenda

6. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): What steps he is taking to improve the UK's performance against the Lisbon score card. [55122]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): The review of the Lisbon agenda will take place at the European Finance Ministers meeting on 14 March and at the European Council on 23 March. I have today published a written statement showing the progress that has been made on the reform agenda under the British presidency. Our proposals include further liberalisation of services, energy and utilities and risk-based regulation—areas where Britain is leading the way in Europe.

Keith Vaz: At a meeting in Brussels last Monday, Commissioner Günter Verheugen stated that 90 per cent. of the Lisbon targets could only be implemented by national Governments on a member state basis. Given the success of the United Kingdom's achievements against the score card—we were fifth overall in terms of progress last year, we are fourth in terms of the entire targets since 2000—what will my right hon. Friend do to encourage other EU countries to match Britain's excellent performance?

Mr. Brown: I have even better news for my hon. Friend: in the last survey, we were third. One of the Lisbon targets is for the overall employment rate to reach 67 per cent. by 2005 and 70 per cent. by 2010—we are at 72 per cent. Another target is for the female employment rate to reach 57 per cent. by 2005—we are at 67 per cent. already. Those are examples of where we are making progress. I will continue to press our colleagues in the rest of Europe to do so. It might help if the Conservatives were to enter the mainstream of European politics.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham) (LD): Further to the answer that the Chancellor has just given on the Government's performance on unemployment, does he agree that, while the claimant count is relatively impressive in the UK, when we take into account the number of people on Government schemes, the number of people who retired early and want to work and the International Labour Organisation measure of unemployment, the true level of unemployment is closer to 10 per cent. than the 3 million figure suggests? Is that a satisfactory basis from which to lecture other members of the European Union?

Mr. Brown: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's figure. Uniquely among our European partners, we have created 2.3 million jobs in the past eight years, and surely even the Liberal Democrats will acknowledge that fact. [Interruption.] I do know whether the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) is giving the hon. Gentleman instructions this morning—he is sat next to him—or is simply acting as his lieutenant. We will see what happens this afternoon, but I understand that very few people have voted in the Liberal Democrat leadership election. For a few months, the Liberal Democrats have been in search of a leader; now, we will see a leader in search of a party.

Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Central Ayrshire) (Lab): On the question of the UK's performance, will my right hon. Friend give some indication of the impact of the high energy costs of the past few months? They could lead to job losses, particularly in my constituency, where up to 2,000 jobs are under pressure as a result.

Mr. Brown: I understand my hon. Friend's worries about energy costs, and the cost of gas in particular has risen very fast recently. It is an achievement of British macro-economic policy that, even despite the big rise in energy prices, the inflation target of some 2 per cent. continues to be met. One issue in terms of pricing is what is happening in the EU energy market, and all Members will agree that it is about time that we saw the full liberalisation of the EU's gas and general energy markets. We estimate that British business would save about £20 billion a year if that happened.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Will the Chancellor be boasting, as he has just done today, to his fellow Finance Ministers about how wonderfully well we are doing and, by implication, how badly they are all doing? In that context, what will he say to the French Finance Minister about the current scandal in France? The French are advancing protectionism, which is completely in conflict with the so-called Lisbon agreement.

Mr. Brown: I would quote the right hon. Gentleman's own Conservative leader, who praised the United Kingdom for doing far better than any other country in the EU. I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that it would help if the Conservatives participated in debates in the EU in a sensible way. Even the leader of the Conservative group in the EU says, "You can't move to the centre ground at home and move to the extreme right abroad. The Conservative policy is just barking".

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, although we have done quite well on the Lisbon agenda targets, that agenda will be undermined if, in a free market such as ours, our companies are opened up to takeovers? France and Germany, however, seem absolutely determined to prevent British companies from doing the same thing in Europe.

Mr. Brown: I accept my hon. Friend's point about the opening up of markets and trade protectionism in general. We will continue to press the EU and America to move further and faster in order to secure a world trade agreement based on the removal of the protectionist policies that have been pursued in the past. Within the EU, we will continue to press for the liberalisation of markets that my hon. Friend proposes, but I must point out that it is free trade countries and countries that are open to competition that are creating jobs. Countries closed to competition are, in the long run, not creating the jobs that they need.

Mr. George Osborne (Tatton) (Con): The Chancellor agrees with me that the big challenge that European countries face is competing in the new global economy. Presumably, he shares my disappointment that Britain's trade deficit with China widened by 20 per cent. last year. What is his explanation for that?

Mr. Brown: We are trading more with China—[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman will just listen. We are trading more with China. I have visited China twice this year and we have signed trade agreements with the Chinese in a range of areas, including financial services. Chinese companies are now registering on the London stock exchange and trade between China and Britain is improving. The hon. Gentleman should be congratulating us on our efforts, instead of criticising us.

Mr. Osborne: I asked the Chancellor about the trade deficit. The truth is that he can change his ties, change his shirts and even change his teeth, but he actually needs to change his economic policies if Britain is to compete in future. So will he comment today on the decision by the internet book retailer Amazon to relocate its European service headquarters from England to Ireland? What is his explanation for that?

Mr. Brown: I will read out what the chairman of the Conservative party's economic research policy commission, the right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood), has said. He has just published—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chancellor has had at least three strikes outside the sphere of the question. I must ask him to confine his answer to the question that has been asked.

Mr. Brown: As you rightly say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I was asked why a company should relocate to Ireland. The right hon. Member for Wokingham's answer was that companies were relocating to Ireland because the EU had heavily subsidised the Irish Republic and thus allowed it to reduce corporation tax. If the shadow Chancellor wishes to be consistent in his approach to economic policy, why does he not remind the House that he has spent months congratulating the Government on establishing economic credibility after improving the macro-economic management of the economy, and admitting that his own policies lack popularity?

Public Sector Pensions

7. Mr. Philip Dunne (Ludlow) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the effect on sustainability of the public finances of public sector pension liabilities. [55123]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): Pension payments from unfunded public sector pension schemes were £16 billion in 2002–03, £17 billion in 2003–04, and £18 billion in 2004–05. As set out in the long-term public finance report published in the pre-Budget report, spending on unfunded pensions as a percentage of gross domestic product remains unchanged. Principally because of a change in the discount rate effects, the Government Actuary's Department estimates the total accrued liability of unfunded public service pension schemes at £530 billion as of 31 March 2005, but the actual payments by Government as a percentage of GDP are the same as set out a year ago.

I shall place a technical note explaining that estimate in the Library of the House today, as the matters involved are quite complex.

Mr. Dunne: I am grateful to the Minister for clarifying that point, and I shall read the technical note with interest. However, the revision to the calculation of the discount rate has increased the public service pension liability by an astonishing amount, from £24 billion annually to £81 billion. At Warwick, did not the Government fail to address the ballooning crisis in funding public sector pensions, and is that not a further reminder that the Chancellor's self-styled reputation for prudent stewardship of the nation's finances is in tatters?

Mr. Browne: I do not wish to be pedantic, but the hon. Gentleman is relying on a figure of £81 billion that he got off the front page of The Daily Telegraph, and it is clear that he has not performed a simple arithmetical calculation between the figure that I have given and the figure that was in the public domain previously. When he comes to read the technical note, that calculation will be very clear.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): It is on page 29.

The hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) will know that the calculation is based on a set of assumptions, and that it is an aggregation of liabilities based on international accounting standards. However, the technical note makes it clear that none of the new information and assumptions used to make the new estimates of total liabilities has any material effect on the future cash payments from the schemes in the longer term, which are set out in the public finance report. The sustainability of the public finances is a function of what has to be paid, and does not depend on a calculation of aggregated liabilities in the long term.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend had any discussions about the funding of local government pension schemes? He will be aware that there is much concern among local government employees, and in local government itself, about how such schemes will be funded.

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend raises an important and live issue, for local government employees and for local government itself—and consequently for council tax payers. However, the distinction between the substance of the question and the local government pension scheme is that the latter is a funded scheme. I am, of course, involved in discussions with my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and with other Ministers in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister about their negotiations and discussions in respect of the scheme, but it would be inappropriate for me to comment on matters that are the responsibility of other Ministers.

Mr. Mark Hoban (Fareham) (Con): According to the pre-Budget report, the annual cost of public sector pensions is set to rise by 0.7 per cent. of GDP over the next 30 years—the equivalent of £8 billion in today's prices. Is the Chief Secretary satisfied that the deal cut by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry at Warwick will make the cost of public sector pensions more sustainable, or does he agree with the Chancellor's remarks in November, when he said that there was still a lot more work to be done?

Mr. Browne: I have given additional figures today that may inform the hon. Gentleman's analysis, but the long-term financial report shows that the cost of public sector unfunded pensions over the next 50 years is sustainable. As for the settlement that was arrived at by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in negotiations with public sector unions for the long-term sustainability of these schemes, we achieved exactly the objectives that we set for savings, and the unions and the work force have agreed to absorb those savings.

Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): May I urge my right hon. Friend to be resolute in resisting panic over the issue of public sector pension liabilities? A relatively small change in the discount rate can produce apparently very much larger figures. My right hon. Friend is not running a hedge fund; he is operating public sector finances. Will he bear it in mind that if he were panicked into taking drastic action on this topic, one effect would be a reduction in public sector borrowing issues, and the problems of private sector pension schemes would therefore be increased?

Mr. Browne: My hon. Friend is precisely correct. On one famous occasion a non-governmental organisation—clearly outside of government—adopted a negative discount rate and suggested a terrifying figure for the cost of unfunded public sector pension schemes. Of course the selection of the discount rate has a significant effect on the calculation. That is why it is important to come back to what the funds cost year on year. The detailed figures that I gave to the hon. Member for Ludlow (Mr. Dunne) in answer to the original question showed that they are sustainable and that it is important to look at the long-term projections that are published with the pre-Budget report and the Budget. This is sustainable provision; it is constantly reviewed and revised. We now accept international accounting standards for public accounts, so we adopt and apply the discount rates that those standards compel us to adopt.

Business Productivity

8. Mr. Brian Binley (Northampton, South) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the productivity of UK business. [55124]

11. Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the productivity of UK business. [55127]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): Productivity is estimated to have grown by around 2.6 per cent. in the first half of the current cycle from 1997, compared with just 2 per cent. in the previous cycle from 1986 to 1997. In addition, the Office for National Statistics has recently announced new estimates for higher investment. Software IT investment in 2003 is now estimated to be not £8 billion but £21 billion. That will mean that the figures will show increased growth, and we will update our estimates for higher productivity.

Mr. Binley: The Chancellor has been keen to claim credit for a strong economy, but on the figures that we have been given Britain's position in the global productivity league table has fallen from fourth to 13th. Does the Chancellor take responsibility for that, or does he blame others?

Mr. Brown: I have just given the hon. Gentleman the figures to show that productivity is higher in this cycle than in the last cycle. I have just given him figures to show that it is 2.6 per cent. on average as opposed to less than 2 per cent. If I may say so, the only years in which productivity has fallen have been Conservative years. In each year of the Labour Government, productivity has risen, and manufacturing productivity rose 5.1 per cent. in 2003 and 5.8 per cent. in 2004.

Mr. Jackson: The Chancellor has stated:

"To secure the fastest productivity growth of our competitors over the next decade . . . business investment must rise."

Under this Government, business is voting with its wallet; business investment is officially now the lowest for 40 years. Would he describe that as prudence with a purpose?

Mr. Brown: These figures are completely wrong. Business investment has been rising under this Government and it continues to rise. I have just given the hon. Gentleman the new figure produced by the ONS, which shows that software investment alone, which people thought was £8 billion in 2003, is actually £21 billion. We have had one of the fastest rates of business investment growth since 1997, and that is to the credit of a Government who have insisted that stability must be the foundation of policy. Should he not be giving us some credit for a 40 per cent. fall in unemployment in his constituency?

Kerry McCarthy (Bristol, East) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the recent rises in productivity have gone hand in hand with rising employment. Does he agree that producing a highly skilled, highly trained work force is crucial to achieving future productivity gains?

Mr. Brown: Under the previous Government, productivity rose slowly and unemployment was high. Under this Government, since 1997, productivity has risen faster and, at the same time, employment has risen. The Conservatives are making a grave mistake if they think that people believe that a British economy that has grown faster, had more stability, met its inflation targets, had low interest rates and rising employment—[Interruption.] The claimant count fell last month, and the Conservatives should give us credit for that. They would be wrong to bank on the idea that the British people believe that the economy has done badly under this Government.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that as welcome as supply-side policies are to improve productivity, the real key is still maintaining macro-economic stability?

Mr. Brown: I accept what my hon. Friend says, and I understand that the Conservative leader has now reached the conclusion that stability is the foundation of what should be done. Since 1997, we have been consistent in supporting stability as the foundation of policy and that required us, in the first instance, to take the difficult decision of making the Bank of England independent—a decision opposed by the Conservatives.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): The Chancellor's comments on business investment levels are worrying. It would be hard for him to find a single economist to agree with him—and few members of the Monetary Policy Committee would agree—that performance has not been lacklustre. Is he now planning his growth against a much lower trend of business investment?

Mr. Brown: The answer is no.

Anne Snelgrove (South Swindon) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the success of Swindon's economy, with the highest gross domestic product per head in the south-west, is due to the UK's competitiveness, our macro-economic stability since 1997 and the productivity of the Swindon work force?

Mr. Brown: I congratulate the Swindon work force on their productivity. Long-term unemployment has fallen by almost 70 per cent. in my hon. Friend's constituency and youth unemployment has fallen by even more. Employment has been rising over the past eight years at a faster rate than in most countries in the European Union—

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): Not now.

Mr. Brown: Well, if I may say so, employment rose by more than 150,000 in the last year. It is difficult to point to many years under the Conservative Government in which that happened.

Growth Forecasts

9. Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): What measures he is taking to improve the reliability of growth forecasts. [55125]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): The best way of obtaining more reliable growth forecasts is to deliver a stable and steadily growing economy. The radical reforms to monetary and fiscal policy that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has put in place have done just that. Britain is no longer the world's stop-go economy, as it was under the Tories. It is now what the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development describes as a paragon of stability.

Mr. Hunt: Given that the Chancellor had to downgrade his growth forecasts for 2004 and 2005 and has now had to downgrade them for 2006 and 2007, is not the most effective way to have reliable forecasts to adopt the Conservative party's proposals for independent assessment of the fiscal rules—the golden rule and the sustainable investments rule—and independent statistics, so that balance sheets, borrowing and other contentious issues are measured transparently?

John Healey: In the pre-Budget report, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor recognised, as did most businesses and forecasters, that 2005 was a particularly tough year. We saw a doubling of world oil prices, weak further growth in the key export market of the European Union and adjustments in the UK economy as we managed down what was double-digit house price inflation. During that year, the UK economy still grew, for the fifth successive year—at a faster rate than the economies in Germany, France, Japan, Italy and the eurozone area—and added a third of a million extra jobs. As the distinguished member of the Monetary Policy Committee, Richard Lambert, said:

"The idea that we could have seen a doubling of oil prices in eighteen months accompanied by a still expanding economy and CPI inflation running at ... just over 2 per cent is absolutely astonishing."

Child Trust Fund

10. Mr. Jim Devine (Livingston) (Lab): What steps he is taking to increase the take-up of the child trust fund; and if he will make a statement. [55126]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ivan Lewis): I am pleased to announce to the House that the latest child trust fund account figures to 20 February show a strong performance: 72 per cent. of the earliest vouchers have been used by parents to open a child trust fund account and nearly 1.5 million child trust fund accounts have been opened in total. The Government continue to encourage parents to open accounts, through activities such as simple step-by-step guides for parents, media advertising and working with a range of community bodies to reach less financially confident families. The child trust fund has kick-started a revolution in the way that the nation saves for its children. It will strengthen the saving habit of future generations and ensure that at the age of 18, for the first time in our history, every child will have access to a financial asset.

Mr. Devine: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that answer. A few moments ago the shadow Chancellor asked the Chancellor to change not only his policies but his shirt. It is a matter of grave concern to me that the shadow Chancellor and I are wearing the same tie, so I will have to get changed.

The scheme has been criticised as unnecessary and expensive, but is not it a really good way of encouraging children to save for the long term?

Mr. Lewis: I assure my hon. Friend that I will not tell his constituents that he was wearing the same tie as the shadow Chancellor, as it would damage his credibility in terms of his ever going home again.

The important point about the policy is that it is at the heart of the kind of society that the Government are seeking to create on a long-term basis, with a savings culture offering opportunities to every child that previously were available only to some, and replacing inter-generational deprivation with inter-generational advance. We need to put the child trust fund alongside enhanced child care and employment opportunities. We are lifting the ambitions and aspirations of families who were previously left behind, shamefully, by the Tories when they were in government.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): From the figures the Minister has given us, we see that almost a third of parents have failed to invest in a scheme. Is it right that Revenue and Customs should make that choice for parents? Does not that go to the heart of what the Government are trying to achieve and show that they have not chosen the most effective scheme?

Mr. Lewis: The point is that, although the doom and gloom merchants said that the take-up of vouchers for accounts would not be above 50 per cent., I can report that the figure is 72 per cent.—but we are not complacent. No child should lose out because a parent fails to convert the voucher into an account after 12 months, which is why we are willing to do it. We intend to continue advertising and promoting, and we want every Member of the House to encourage parents in their constituency to take advantage of those opportunities. The helpline number is 0845 3021470—I urge Members to get on and advertise it to parents.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I very much welcome the improvement in take-up of the scheme, which has been really important for my constituents. As my hon. Friend is a former Education Minister, can he say whether the Treasury will promote take-up through Sure Start and children's centres so that this important scheme reaches some of the most excluded families?

Mr. Lewis: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. When we reach out to people who were financially excluded in the past, it is incredibly important that we are far more imaginative and innovative. Whether through Sure Start schemes, health visitors, grass-roots, community and voluntary organisations or faith groups, it is very important that we are innovative and imaginative as we seek to reach every individual.

Working Tax Credit

12. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): Whether he plans to make changes to the working tax credit scheme. [55128]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The child and working tax credits are designed to make work pay and reduce poverty, and nearly 2 million individuals are benefiting. Research published today shows that tax credit take-up rates for families with children reached an unprecedented level in the first year of operation. Figures show take-up of about 80 per cent. overall and 90 per cent. for the poorest families, which compares with 57 per cent. in the first year of family credit. Additional research on how family incomes vary shows that the flexible nature of the working tax credit and child credit helps to smooth income, particularly for disadvantaged groups. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the 2005 pre-Budget report announced a series of reforms to be introduced over the next 18 months, which will give families more certainty about their tax credit award while maintaining the flexibility that is crucial.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the Paymaster General for that detailed reply, but she will be aware that the administration of the system is certainly in chaos. Many people have been given money to which they were not entitled. That has not been their fault; they have provided information, which the system has not been able to take on board. The Paymaster General has, for example, increased the disregard from £2,500 to £25,000, but that addresses only part of the problem. Surely, it is better to make the system efficient, rather than using a sledgehammer to crack a nut. What on earth will that cost?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the announcements made in the pre-Budget report in 2005 were widely welcomed as precisely the way to continue to improve the tax credit system. I reiterate that the take-up rate for the poorest families is over 90 per cent., which does not show the failure in the scheme that he suggests. I also remind him that, in 1997, a one-child family on average earnings received just £11 a week for help with their child. By April 2006, that figure will be somewhere near £62. That is a success. Take-up continues to grow, and it is about time that the Conservative party started to support the tax credit scheme, instead of constantly trying to knock it and undermine it.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, South-West) (Lab/Co-op): Although the scheme is undoubtedly excellent, does the Paymaster General accept that the Government are not necessarily getting the credit that they deserve? Would it not be much better if individual Members—particularly Labour Members, who support the tax credit scheme—were given the opportunity to present the cheques directly to those of their constituents who receive the money?

Dawn Primarolo: I can understand the attraction to Members of my hon. Friend's proposal. I have a feeling that the administration would be somewhat expensive, but he makes the point that every Member has thousands of families, with thousands of children, benefiting from tax credits, and Members need to ensure that they understand the benefits of the scheme before they start knocking it and trying to undermine people's confidence in it.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): Will the Paymaster General now clarify when she was first briefed by officials of the Inland Revenue on the organised criminal fraud in the tax credit system?

Dawn Primarolo: Yes, I can confirm that all the parliamentary answers that I have given to the House, including those to the hon. Gentleman, give the correct information and that the House has been kept fully informed.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): Labour Members welcome the announcement in the pre-Budget report which will streamline the administration of tax credits, because we fundamentally believe that tax credits are a good system, but will my right hon. Friend give me an indication of the time scale for those who are on income support to migrate on to the tax credit system?

Dawn Primarolo: I promised to keep the House informed of developments in the transfer of income support and jobseeker's allowance claimants to the tax credit system. I will continue to do that, but I have nothing further to add now. My hon. Friend raises an important point about a particularly vulnerable group, which other hon. Members on both sides of the House have raised, and we need to be sure that the system will be right.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): The Paymaster General pointedly refused to answer the question about the cost of the tenfold increase in the income disregard, but when senior officials in Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs gave evidence to the Public Accounts Committee on 14 December, they admitted that that separate figure had been calculated, and offered to provide it to PAC

"in liaison with our Treasury colleagues".

However, that liaison has been going on for two and a half months and has not come to a conclusion. As Ministers obviously have a figure for what the income disregard will cost, when will they share it with the House and the British taxpayer, so that we know how much that very major element of the Chancellor's pet project will really cost?

Dawn Primarolo: I really cannot help the hon. Gentleman if he does not read the papers and the information that is presented to the House. He will see in the pre-Budget report that the costings were provided for the package. He has seen the explanation that the package interrelates with obligations and benefits, and that it is the net cost of the package that has been identified to the House. He knows that. It is nonsense to try to separate the individual items, because it is their interaction that produces the cost that needs to be accounted for to the House.

Public Funding (South-west)

13. Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): What estimate he has made of the amount of public funding the south-west region will receive in 2005–06. [55129]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): The south-west region, like all parts of the United Kingdom, is benefiting from increased investment in public services. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to hear that the latest available figures show that, for 2004–05, the total identified expenditure invested in the south-west was projected to be about £30 billion—almost £6,000 per head. Information on public funding in the south-west region for 2005–06 will be published by the Government in the spring in their public expenditure statistical analysis.

Mr. Ellwood: I am grateful for that reply. I understand that the cost of the South West regional assembly is about £4 million a year. Regional assemblies are robbing local councils of their power. Why are taxpayers being made to pay for a deeply unpopular organisation that they never had the opportunity to vote for in the first place?

Dawn Primarolo: I reiterate to the hon. Gentleman what his Conservative colleagues in the regional chamber said to him when he stood up and spoke on this subject before, which was that it is good to make sure that one's policy is consistent across the party. He has called for more investment in transport, technical colleges, and recycling and regeneration. He knows full well that that has to be paid for and it is about time that he, with his colleagues, started to understand how.

Off-balance-sheet Debt

14. James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): What recent assessment he has made of the effect of off-balance-sheet debt on the sustainability of the public finances. [55130]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Des Browne): The Government are meeting their fiscal rules and the long-term public finance report shows that public finances remain sound and sustainable. The risk of off-balance-sheet projects lies with the private sector. Under the UK's internationally agreed and independently measured national accounts, off-balance-sheet debt is not included in measures of public net debt. The decision about whether any individual private finance initiative is on or off balance sheet is made in accordance with the UK's accounting standards. It is made independently of Government by the relevant audit body.

James Brokenshire: Now that the Office for National Statistics has decided to reclassify the borrowings of London and Continental Railways to bring them on balance sheet and therefore make them part of Government debt, is it not time to review the off-balance-sheet status of Network Rail's debts to give a clearer picture of whether the Chancellor's sustainable investment rule in relation to the country's national debt is being complied with?

Mr. Browne: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, the answer lies in his question. It is the independent assessment, which is carried out according to international accounting standards agreed by treaty, that judges whether a debt is on or off balance sheet. In both cases, the National Audit Office makes that decision independently. Rather than the Government making a decision in relation to one piece of debt and the National Audit Office making a decision in another case, we should leave things as they are. We should leave the decision with the independent body, which applies the same national standards and rules to one railway operation as it does to the other. That is precisely what we will do.

New Deal (Swansea, East)

15. Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): How many young people have been assisted by the new deal in Swansea, East; and if he will make a statement. [55131]

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): Since 1998, the new deal has helped 3,170 young unemployed people in Swansea, East and 1,870 young people have found work through the new deal, contributing to a 75 per cent. reduction in the number of unemployed young people in the constituency claiming benefit for more than six months. Independent evidence has repeatedly demonstrated the impact of the new deal and suggests that overall youth unemployment has been reduced nationally by between 30,000 and 40,000.

Mrs. James: I appreciate my right hon. Friend's answer. I recently met one of my constituents who praised what the new deal had done for his teenage daughter, who is a lone parent. The new deal helped her to train as a hairdresser and provided support for child care. No doubt she would still be on benefit had the scheme not existed. Her parents were profoundly grateful to the Government. Will the Government ensure that the new deal continues to help young people?

Dawn Primarolo: As the House will know, in 1997 Britain had the fastest growing youth unemployment and long-term unemployment in Europe. The contribution of the new deal to helping young people return to work, and the return of others to work through the programme, has proved a huge success. The Government are committed to its continuation, unlike the Conservative party, which wants to abolish the new deal, presumably because it thinks that unemployment is a price worth paying.

Business of the House

11.30 am

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead) (Con): Will the Leader of the House give us the business for the coming week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The business for next week will be as follows.

MONDAY 6 MARCH—Second Reading of the Police and Justice Bill.

TUESDAY 7 MARCH—Remaining stages of the Merchant Shipping (Pollution) Bill [Lords], followed by motion to take note of various European documents relating to Financial Management.

WEDNESDAY 8 MARCH—Second Reading of the Road Safety Bill [Lords].

THURSDAY 9 MARCH—Remaining stages of the Childcare Bill.

FRIDAY 10 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 13 MARCH—Second Reading of the Northern Ireland (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill, followed by consideration of Lords Amendments to the Terrorism Bill.

TUESDAY 14 MARCH—Remaining stages of the Animal Welfare Bill.

WEDNESDAY 15 MARCH—Second Reading of the Education and Inspection Bill.

THURSDAY 16 MARCH—Consideration of Lords Amendments.

FRIDAY 17 MARCH—Private Members' Bills.

Mrs. May: I thank the Leader of the House for giving us the business for the next two weeks. True to his word, the Education and Inspection Bill was published by the end of February—just. There is, of course, considerable interest in this issue. The Prime Minister has described the reforms as the crux of his agenda and "extremely important to the future of a Labour government".

I ask the Leader of the House again whether he will allow two days of debate on Second Reading to ensure that hon. Members have proper time to air their views on the Government's reforms.

There is growing concern about the impact of avian flu on the United Kingdom. Indeed, the Government's chief scientific adviser has said that it will be with us for a number of years. Given the different views on the value of vaccination and public interest in this matter, may we have a debate in Government time on avian flu and the Government's strategy for handling it?

I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will have seen the letter in The Times today from Sir David Attenborough, co-signed among others by the executive director of Friends of the Earth, the director of conservation of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the executive director of Greenpeace. The letter refers to the proposal by the Natural Environment Research Council to close five out of the nine centres of the Centre for Ecology and Hydrology. It says that the cuts are "scientifically flawed" and "will . . . have a serious detrimental effect on the Government's ability to make policy that is based on sound scientific research."

Given the significance of climate change, to which the issue relates among other things, will the Leader of the House arrange for publication of the evidence given by DEFRA to the NERC review and for a debate on the issue?

In business questions recently, hon. Members on both sides of the House have raised the Government's proposal to remove the Post Office card account. We have had interesting debates on the different meanings of "interim" and "temporary". I understand from papers placed in the Library that it is not clear that it was made apparent to those signing contracts with the Post Office that the account was either interim or temporary.

Given that the Post Office has said that it could run the mail service on only 4,000 branches, which would mean a cut of more than 10,000 post office branches, and given that many constituencies throughout the country, including mine, are already reeling from the impact of post office closures, will the Leader of the House make Government time available for a debate on the future of the Post Office, and in particular on the Government's strategy on whether or not they want to keep our rural and suburban post offices?

Finally, yesterday, in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) on the present inquiry by the Cabinet Secretary, the Prime Minister said:

"We will, of course, examine any allegations that are made, and reply to them fully."—[Official Report, 1 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 254.]

Will the Leader of the House confirm the Prime Minister's position?

Mr. Hoon: I am delighted to welcome the right hon. Lady's observations on a range of policy matters. This week, in the spirit of giving credit where credit is due, we have witnessed the wholesale conversion of the Conservative party to large parts of the Labour Government's manifesto. The phrase about sinners repenting comes to mind. We all want the Opposition to maintain their commitment to economic stability, which they say is a good thing; to protecting the environment—we have been telling them so for years; and to the belief that poverty is a bad thing. The fact that the Conservative party has admitted that is progress of sorts. It wants, too, to encourage family-friendly policies.

I am sure that Opposition Members would benefit from reading the rest of the Labour Government's manifesto. I have it with me and would be delighted to make it available to the right hon. Lady so that, when her party publishes its next document—the present one is curiously entitled "Built to Last", presumably followed by the words "for at least a week"—it can continue in the same spirit and adopt our manifesto. Government Members are delighted by that progress, just as we are delighted with progress on the Education and Inspections Bill. I am sure that there will be adequate opportunity for hon. Members to debate that important measure in due course. We have debated on several occasions the Government's excellent preparations to deal with the prospect of a flu crisis.

As for climate change, the right hon. Lady is entirely in order in raising those issues, but it would be helpful if she were in order on her own party's policies. As for the Centre for Ecology and Hydrology, there is no doubt about the Government's commitment to fund high-quality scientific research. The funding of the overall science budget and the Natural Environment Research Council is outstanding. Indeed, it has doubled since 1997. It is important that that organisation should set its own scientific priorities. It is not right for Ministers and politicians to determine the way in which that money is spent. It is for that organisation to judge how best to develop its own research.

We have had a number of discussions about the Post Office card account in recent months, but I should have thought that everyone was united in the objective of ensuring the continuation of the services that the Post Office provides to people who take advantage of the Post Office card account. Everyone will accept that it is sensible, given the long lead time during which the Government are funding the card, that we should find ways of encouraging people to continue to take advantage of the Post Office and use a range of other services that it offers. If Opposition Members had thought this through, they would see that there is a clear and obvious link between the Post Office card and the future of the Post Office, which provides a range of services. It should be clear to people using the card—[Interruption.] I hope that the right hon. Lady will listen—I listened to her—instead of screeching from the Front Bench. I hope that we all share a commitment to the Post Office and the services that it provides. It makes available a range of accounts, which should be used to support the people who use the Post Office card.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I do not know whether the Leader of the House had the opportunity yesterday to visit the "Stop Climate Chaos" lobby across the road, but would it not be opportune to hold a debate on early-day motion 178?

[That this House agrees with the Government's Chief Scientific Adviser that climate change is a threat to civilisation; welcomes the cross-party agreement in favour of major cuts in greenhouse gas emissions, and particularly in carbon dioxide emissions, by 2050; believes that such a long-term target will best be met through a series of more regular milestones; and therefore notes the Climate Change Bill that was presented by a cross-party group of honourable Members in the final days before the General Election, and hopes that such a Bill will be brought forward in this Parliament so that annual cuts in carbon dioxide emissions of 3 per cent. can be delivered in a framework that includes regular reporting and new scrutiny and corrective processes.]

The motion was tabled by the right hon. Member for Oldham, West and Royton (Mr. Meacher) and signed by no fewer than 338 hon. Members, including almost the entire Liberal Democrat parliamentary party. This is an important issue, and it needs to be debated in the House.

May we have a debate on higher education, given that this year the number of applications to universities fell for the first time in six years, with a particularly pronounced fall among English students applying to English universities, which suggests that tuition fees are an important factor?

If we are to properly address terrorism, as of course we must, would it not be the right time to examine again the admissibility of intercept evidence? Perhaps the Police and Justice Bill is an opportunity to do so, given the view expressed by Assistant Commissioner Andy Hayman last week that to continue banning telephone tap evidence would be foolish.

Lastly, may we have a debate in Government time on the Government's view of local government? The Minister of Communities and Local Government gave his views last week about what he called "double devolution" without mentioning local authorities at all. We also have the Secretary of State for Education and Skills determining that local education authorities cannot build schools without her having a veto, and the Home Secretary wanting to appoint police authorities himself. Do the Government still believe in local government?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising those matters. This is probably the last day on which I will be able to comment on his prospects of becoming the leader of the Liberal Democrats. There does not seem to be any sign of a write-in vote, but we live in hope. We have yet to see the result of that magnificent contest.

I was intrigued to discover the other day that the party committed to proportional representation seems to have failed to persuade its own Members of Parliament to cast their second preference votes. Since the party constantly, at business questions and on other occasions, encourages the Government to consider the benefits of proportional representation, which presumably involves second, third and other preference votes, it is surprising that members of the Liberal Democrat party in the House do not seem to have followed their own advice. I was intrigued to see comments by various Members, including the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), who apparently said:

"I filled it in the other day after it came. I honestly can't remember whether I just went for Ming and not the other two, or voted for Chris second. It wasn't something I regarded as being a terribly important decision at the time."

I wonder whether the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) was adopting the same approach as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who said:

"I have not declared, basically because"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I have given the right hon. Gentleman a very generous run. I take the old-fashioned view that this session is about the business for next week. If everyone is hoping to catch my eye in the time available, that is what we should do.

Mr. Hoon: I entirely agree, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

With reference to the questions raised by the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome, I have already dealt with climate change. The Government would always be delighted to debate the matter. The United Kingdom is on course to meet and exceed its Kyoto target—one of only two of the EU 15 to do so. We have an outstanding record in this regard, of which the Government are extraordinarily proud.

On higher education, there is a clear explanation for the adjustment in the figures for this year. Last year, there was a significant increase in the number of university applications. Not surprisingly, that has been adjusted. It is impossible to keep up that level of increase, but overall there is a significant increase in the number of people applying for university places, which the Government strongly support.

On the admissibility of intercept evidence, anyone responsible for trying to bring terrorists and other significant criminals to justice wants as much evidence as possible to be made available to the court. That is not the issue. I hope the hon. Gentleman will think about this carefully. The issue is the extent to which making intercept evidence available jeopardises the way in which that evidence is secured. Frankly, that is a difficult balance to strike. I have seen the product of such intercepts, and it would be extremely dangerous for the future of our security services and the means that they adopt if we were to allow such evidence to be adduced in court and challenged in cross-examination. He must think through those important issues.

The Government are undertaking a number of important pieces of work on local government. I anticipate that a White Paper will be produced in due course, as a result of which there will be lots of opportunities for hon. Members to debate the matter.

Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): No topic is more controversial locally than the disposal of waste. Although I do not expect my right hon. Friend to comment on a controversial planning application in my constituency, can we have an urgent debate on the strategy for waste recycling and disposal, including incineration? If he cannot find time to hold a debate immediately, will he ask his ministerial colleagues in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Department of Trade and Industry to put the best available scientific evidence in the public domain, which would allow hon. Members to deal with the matter constructively?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that issue, which is important up and down the country. He takes a considerable interest in such matters, so he knows that the Government have devoted an enormous amount of extra effort to, for example, promoting recycling, which is an important part of waste disposal. The level of recycling in this country has been significantly improved, but more needs to be done to meet the standards achieved in other European countries, so I am grateful for his interest in the subject.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): I thank the Leader of the House in anticipation of his finding time to debate the health funding crisis in Shropshire. Is he aware that patients are being told that beds are no longer available because of the low nurse to patient ratio at the Princess Royal hospital? The primary care back-up services are insufficient, which means that my constituents are suffering.

Mr. Hoon: I do not in any way minimise the difficulties and challenges faced by those responsible for providing health care in Shropshire, but the hon. Gentleman knows that there has been huge investment in the national health service. The amount of money made available for health care will have tripled between 1997 and 2007–08. When he refers to a health funding crisis, he must put it in this context: 432 out of 566 NHS organisations provide a service by balancing their books, and if three quarters of the national health service can do that, there is no reason why the rest cannot do the same. Only around 4 per cent. of NHS organisations account for 50 per cent. of the overspend, and it is perfectly reasonable for the Government to say in the light of the huge amount of extra money being put into the NHS that those organisations that are failing to balance their books should look hard at why that is the case.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I note that next week's provisional business covers Monday 13 March, which is Commonwealth day. Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 1709, which has been signed by numerous hon. Members, including me?

[That this House, in common with all parliaments of the Commonwealth, gladly observes Commonwealth Day on Monday 13th March; sincerely supports this year's theme of Health and Vitality—The Commonwealth Challenge, emphasising the Commonwealth's commitment to health and fitness to bring hope to the world; and recognises the excellent work done by the United Kingdom branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in partnership with its sister branches in the advancement of parliamentary democracy and good governance throughout the Commonwealth.]

Despite the pressures of parliamentary business, would it not be appropriate to have a debate in Government time on the performance, role, objectives and future of the Commonwealth's promotion of parliamentary democracy and good governance in countries throughout the world?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has raised an important issue. The Government strongly support the Commonwealth and I share his commitment to Commonwealth day and what it represents. If he were to apply to secure an Adjournment debate in this House or Westminster Hall, I am sure that that topic would be suitable.

Mr. Graham Stuart (Beverley and Holderness) (Con): My constituents are extremely concerned about the news, which the shadow Leader of the House has mentioned, that 10,000 more post offices around the country may be closed. Post offices are particularly important to people in isolated rural communities, and it is the old, those who do not have transport and the poorest members of our society who most depend on their services. Those people are concerned that the Government are not committed to rural post offices because of the withdrawal of the Post Office card account. The Leader of the House has said that the Government are committed to rural post offices, but can we have a debate as soon as possible?

Mr. Hoon: I have already emphasised the Government's commitment to postal services, particularly rural postal services. We all know that local post offices play a vital role in the community in many small towns and villages. The Government remain committed to that. That is why we introduced the Post Office account and why we continue to want the people who use that account to use postal services. Some 25 Post Office accounts are available to people, and they are simple and straightforward to use. The whole purpose of the various pilots that have been conducted recently is to encourage people to move away from the account to use other Post Office accounts that will give them greater benefits than are currently available to them, not least interest on their accounts.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): It is some time since the House was given an opportunity to debate progress on the Government's 10-year strategy on the misuse of drugs. Several issues are in the headlines at the moment. The Home Secretary is considering the classification of drugs, many Members are worried about the increasing use of methamphetamine, and drug deaths are on the increase. May I ask the Government to give us the opportunity to debate progress on their strategy?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise an issue that is important everywhere. The Government have used their considerable powers all over the country, and indeed internationally, to deal with the threat that drugs pose in our society. We regularly discuss that in this House and I am sure that such opportunities will be given to hon. Members in due course.

Dr. Andrew Murrison (Westbury) (Con): Will the Leader of the House encourage his right hon. Friend the Health Secretary to attend the House as soon as possible to explain why her welcome commitment to community hospitals, as laid out in the recent White Paper, is being so flagrantly ignored by primary care trusts, notably West Wiltshire primary care trust in respect of Westbury hospital, which is due virtually to close this weekend?

Mr. Hoon: I happened to be in the Chamber yesterday evening, and I am sure that I saw my right hon. Friend the Health Secretary here to participate in debates concerned with the health service. [Interruption.] Opposition Members are making noises from sedentary positions, but I know that their ingenuity is sufficient to allow them to raise such questions in the context of yesterday's debate.

Clive Efford (Eltham) (Lab): My right hon. Friend announced that we are to debate the Education and Inspections Bill on 15 March. No doubt we will be treated to long speeches from the Front Bench and curtailed time for Back Benchers to contribute. With that in mind, will he ensure that when we come to discuss the detail of the Bill on Report, ample time is allocated so that we can all contribute to this very important debate about the future of our education service?

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry that my hon. Friend, who is usually an outgoing and optimistic Member of this House, takes, if he will forgive me for saying so, such a cynical view of our proceedings. My experience of speaking from the Dispatch Box is that the length of Front-Bench speeches is largely the result of the number of interventions that are taken. Perhaps if my hon. Friends resist the temptation to intervene on the Minister there will be more time available for Back-Bench contributions. To deal with my hon. Friend's substantive point, it is important that the House has a full opportunity to debate and discuss these issues, and I am confident that sufficient time will be made available.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): May I thank the Speaker and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for helping me, following the point of order that I made 13 or 14 days ago, to extract the secret contract between the Post Office and the Government in 2002? It revealed that the POCA—Post Office card account—was intended to be an interim step for account holders. Incredibly, however, the contract that went to benefit customers did not mention the fact that the card was meant to be interim or temporary—words which, for the benefit of the Leader of the House, are synonymous according to the dictionary. That is an extraordinary deceit pulled on millions of benefit holders. The fact that the Government now intend to shift all benefit recipients on to direct payment, regardless of what the Leader of the House just said, means that 14,400 post offices across the country may be in jeopardy because Adam Crozier came to the all-party group on sub-post offices and said that he needs only 4,000 to run a postal service. Can we please have a debate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. At the risk of losing the gratitude of the hon. Gentleman, I think that he got his question in just in time.

Mr. Hoon: And a fairly predictable one it was, as well. I seize on one part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks—"regardless of what the Leader of the House just said." I am not sure that he can ignore what I said in quite the way that he has chosen to do. We all want rural postal services to be preserved and, indeed, enhanced where appropriate. We all want to ensure that people who currently use the post office to receive their benefits continue to do so and that a large number of simple and straightforward Post Office accounts are available. Surely all that means that it is wholly sensible to continue to have the benefits paid in this way and, moreover, to enhance the interest available to the hon. Gentleman's constituents, and other constituents around the country, through using the other Post Office accounts.

Paul Flynn (Newport, West) (Lab): When can we have a debate on early-day motion 1316, which draws attention to the dangers of contaminated air in aircraft?

[That this House is concerned that medical and scientific evidence shows that as many as 200,000 passengers a year are exposed to air contaminated with organophosphates and hydrocarbon compounds on UK registered aircraft and that the number of contaminated events in 2005 reported by the British Airline Pilots Association, were a record high; regrets the lack of UK research into the danger of exposure to pyrolised engine oils; notes that effective filtration systems costing less than £10,000 per aircraft are available and calls for their mandatory use to reduce serious risks to the health of the travelling public and operating crews; and believes that passengers should be informed when they have been exposed to air contamination on UK registered aircraft.]

That matter has been raised by the British Air Line Pilots Association, which is greatly anxious about the incidents that occurred last year in which 200,000 passengers on British planes were exposed to contamination from fumes from organophosphates and hydrocarbons. Since the early-day motion was tabled on 9 January, there has been a further incident in a plane flying from Belfast airport whereby the pilot became incapacitated and could not react to his safety instructions. The other pilot had to take over, and the flight was recalled to Belfast airport. There is a serious danger of a catastrophe—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think that the Leader of the House has probably got the gist. The hon. Gentleman must not use all his arguments in advance of the debate that he may be granted.

Mr. Hoon: I could not have put it better myself, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that this matter is taken extremely seriously by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. It is being investigated, and I will ensure that he writes to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Nigel Dodds (Belfast, North) (DUP): May we have a debate in Government time on Government measures to help to create and sustain job and employment opportunities in economically deprived areas? Such a debate would allow us to raise the issue of the Trivirix plant in west Belfast. Sadly, that constituency is not represented in this House by its elected Member, but I am happy to raise the concerns of workers and constituents on this occasion. Those workers have been badly treated, and the management have simply abandoned the operation. I urge the Leader of the House to allow a debate so that we can highlight those issues.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman makes his point with his customary clarity. I am sure that the issue will be considered very carefully by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware that next month sees the introduction of the Government's scheme for free bus travel for pensioners. Is he aware that a serious anomaly has arisen in Tyne and Wear, where there is a £5.5 million shortfall in funding the scheme? Given the urgency of the situation, can we have a debate next week to establish how it has arisen and what might be done about it, and, in particular, to make it clear that it is not local councillors, but Ministers and mandarins in Whitehall, who are responsible?

Mr. Hoon: I emphasise to my hon. Friend the importance that the Government attach to bus travel and bus services. That is why a significant amount of money has been made available right across the country to ensure that free bus travel and other concessionary schemes are available to our constituents. I will invite my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to respond directly on the specific issue in my hon. Friend's constituency.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): When can we expect a statement from the Secretary of State for Defence on the future size and shape of the Territorial Army? It has been rumoured—and interestingly not denied—that the TA unit in Shetland is to be closed as part of the rebalancing exercise. If true, we will be left with no military presence in Shetland and any Shetlander wishing to serve in the TA will be denied the opportunity to do so. An Army spokesman told us in January that an announcement would be made in the House in early to middle February. When will we get it?

Mr. Hoon: I know from my experience in the Ministry of Defence the importance that it and the Government attach to the contribution of members of the TA to our armed forces. In recent years, they have provided an indispensable source of support for regular forces in ways that would not have been recognised historically. Instead of simply training regularly, they now train and deploy, often alongside their regular Army counterparts. The Ministry of Defence therefore attaches great importance to the service that they provide.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on special schools? There is a good school for those with moderate learning difficulties in my constituency, which Ofsted rated as excellent, yet the Conservative council in Wandsworth plan to close it. A debate would give us time to explain Government policy—and, I believe, that of the Leader of the Opposition—that we should not close special schools but ensure that parents have a choice between special and mainstream schools. Hon. Members of all parties should support that policy.

Mr. Hoon: I recognise the concern that has been caused to my hon. Friend's constituents. The Government's position is clear: it is for local education authorities rather than for Ministers to determine school provision in their area. That is a matter for school organisation committees, but that policy does not appear to be followed with any consistency by Conservative-controlled local authorities, which act as they think fit, and not according to the policy that the Conservative party leader set out.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): I do not know how much the Leader of the House knows about planning, but it appears that Her Majesty's Government are changing the planning status of airfields by characterising them as brownfield sites. Of course, we need more affordable housing in the countryside but surely such a far-reaching change should be properly consulted upon.

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that a far-reaching change would be consulted upon. Obviously, it is important that the appropriate planning rules should be applied to specific circumstances. I have no doubt that that will happen and I assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no significant change in Government policy on that.

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend grant time for a debate on the postcode lottery and loss of patient choice for those requesting stem cell salvage from umbilical cord blood samples? My constituent, Claudia Harrison, has multiple sclerosis. She wants a simple blood test taken from the umbilical cord when her baby is born in June. My local hospital has refused that request, yet the hospital 17 miles down the road will do the blood test, but only if she transfers her ante-natal care to it. It is unfair that parents are faced with the choice of either travelling extensive distances for a test that will cost nothing to the local hospital—my constituent will pay for the stem cell banking—or doing without it. It is unfair and not right that parents should face such choices, and the House should debate the subject.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made her point clearly. I shall not comment on an individual case with which I am not familiar but I am sure that, if it raises wider issues, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health will respond accordingly.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): May we have an early debate on the Government's plans for reform of the House of Lords? At the weekend, the Lord Chancellor hinted that there would be a fresh initiative to take forward the stalled reform but, since then, the line appears to have gone cold. May we have a debate or will the Leader of the House tell us what is going on?

Mr. Hoon: The Government clearly set out their position on the House of Lords in our manifesto. I checked the Conservative party's policy on that but it is difficult to determine. [Interruption.] I hear groans from Conservative Members, but my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor clearly said that there needed to be some consensus on the matter. That requires the Conservative party to think about what its policy might be on House of Lords reform, not least because we have never been entirely clear whether it continues to support the concept of preserving the rights of those who inherited their seats in our legislature. If the Conservative party was clear about that, there might be an opportunity to hold a debate.

Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North) (Lab): May we have a debate on the future of the winter fuel allowance? It would give us an opportunity to remind the public of the great contribution that the allowance has made to alleviating fuel poverty and that the Opposition parties voted systematically against it, and to consider, if the Chancellor were inclined to increase the allowance in a future Budget, whether it would be better to convert it into an energy efficiency allowance rather than simply increasing the cash payment. That would avoid simply increasing the profits of the multinational utilities by increasing household energy efficiency and reducing carbon dioxide emissions. May we have a debate on the matter?

Mr. Hoon: I recently confirmed the date of the Budget. I take my hon. Friend's carefully thought-through, well-reasoned argument to be an early submission to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I assure my hon. Friend that there will be every opportunity to debate the Budget in the subsequent days.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): Earlier, the Leader of the House failed to answer the final question of my right hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May), so let me give him another opportunity to do so. Yesterday, my hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. Bacon) asked the Prime Minister:

"Will the present inquiry by the Cabinet Secretary examine whether the Home Office acted improperly in relation to an extradition request involving Mr. Mills?"

The Prime Minister replied:

"We will, of course, examine any allegations that are made, and reply to them fully."—[Official Report, 1 March 2006; Vol. 443, c. 254.]

Does that remain the case, given the remarks in the press? Will the Prime Minister make a statement next week to confirm that those allegations are being properly investigated by Sir Gus O'Donnell?

Mr. Hoon: I did not respond directly to the right hon. Member for Maidenhead because, as all hon. Members know, there is a continuing inquiry, the results of which will be set out in the appropriate way shortly.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that 10 years have passed since the horrific massacre of a teacher and children at Dunblane? Does he agree that now is therefore an appropriate time for a debate about what has happened since? We could then discover, for example, why we have no central register of gun licensees. I acknowledge that other measures have been introduced and they are appreciated.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising a subject that continues to be a source of great sadness. It was a terrible tragedy. Cutting gun crime in this country remains one of the Government's top priorities and I hope that she accepts that we have taken several steps to achieve that. I recognise and share the disappointment that the national firearms licensing management scheme has taken so long to deliver. The Government remain fully committed to the project, which is planned to be rolled out in all forces in England and Wales from June, assuming that the final pilot in May is successful.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): Irrespective of the outcome of the inquiry by Gus O'Donnell, does the Leader of the House believe that it would be timely to hold a debate on the ministerial code of conduct to remind Ministers of their responsibilities, whatever their complicated personal circumstances, and so that we can work out whether the code is worth the paper it is written on?

Mr. Hoon: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman can simply say that there should be such a debate

"irrespective" of a continuing inquiry, not least because the inquiry demonstrates how seriously my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister always takes such matters. The ministerial code exists to govern the conduct of Ministers during and after a period of office. All Ministers are made aware of it and, in my estimation, consistently adhere to it. The Prime Minister has shown his continued commitment to the code and its enforcement. The hon. Gentleman should accept that.

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): We all welcome the introduction of free pensioner travel, but will my right hon. Friend make time for a debate on the anomalies associated with it? Unfortunately, in Lancashire, the availability of free travel will vary from district to district unless we can reach an agreement on the matter. We all recognise that, when we discussed free local travel, we intended it to apply within county areas, not districts. Pensioners in Wales and Scotland have free travel across the country, and we need to ensure that that also applies to England.

Mr. Hoon: That sounds like an ingenious rephrasing of a previous question that I failed to answer. I am not going to get drawn into the difficulties of ensuring free pensioner travel across Lancashire, but I will ensure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport deals with the matter.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The Leader of the House will be aware that, in Scottish questions, a great deal of anxiety was expressed about the propriety of Scottish Members voting on English-only business. May we have a debate on that issue? The House needs to assert the principle of accountability, which means that Members of Parliament are accountable to their constituents. If their constituents are not affected by the decisions that they take, there is no accountability, and that infringes on the basic principle of democracy.

Mr. Hoon: I am not sure that I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman. This is probably not the occasion on which to have a profound debate on the nature of our constitution, but the truth is that right hon. and hon. Members routinely vote on matters that do not directly affect their own constituents. I know the right hon. and learned Gentleman to be a strong supporter of the Union, and he has in his time been a member of the Conservative and Unionist party, so I am slightly surprised by the implication of his question, which would be to challenge that Union. That is not something that I, or, I hope, he would want.

Pete Wishart (Perth and North Perthshire) (SNP): Has the Leader of the House had the opportunity to consider early-day motion 1489?

[That this House considers that the work of the Department for International Development is of the highest importance; notes that only half an hour per month is allocated for questions to the Secretary of State; believes that hon. Members should have one hour per month for this purpose; and calls upon the Leader of the House, on behalf of the Government, to make this necessary change at the earliest opportunity.]

The motion calls for an extension of the time allowed for questions to the Secretary of State for International Development. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that half an hour just before Prime Minister's questions is clearly insufficient for a subject in which so many hon. Members take a keen interest? Will he seriously consider this request?

Mr. Hoon: I have seen the early-day motion. Indeed, I have also seen correspondence dealing with the matter. In the course of planning the parliamentary timetable from week to week and month to month, it is difficult to ensure that appropriate priority is given to all the subjects that are debated here. The difficulty that I face on behalf of the business managers is that if more time is given to one subject, less must necessarily be given to another. When the hon. Gentleman considers making a further submission on this matter, perhaps he could suggest what might be cut out of the parliamentary calendar, rather than what should be added to it.

Andrew Gwynne (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): In November, I secured an Adjournment debate on the crazy decision by the Liberal Democrat-controlled Stockport council to develop a new primary school on a former landfill site without first having conducted a full environmental impact study. Since then, the leader of Stockport council has assured local residents in Reddish that the Greater Manchester geological unit would conduct such a survey. This week, however, I received a letter from the GMGU stating that its investigations did not constitute a full environmental impact study. Will the Leader of the House make time for a debate on planning regulations relating to the development of former landfill sites?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend has made his case extremely effectively. I know from my own constituency the sensitivity that surrounds planning applications for landfill sites. Such applications understandably arouse a great deal of concern and sometimes controversy. My hon. Friend has made his point, and I am sure that an opportunity will arise in due course for those issues to be debated on the Floor of the House.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (South-West Norfolk) (Con): Will the Leader of the House make time for a debate on the plight of sugar beet farmers in constituencies such as mine? Those farmers have two significant concerns about the reform of the EU sugar regime. The first involves the method of allocating compensation payments; the second relates to how the reforms are to be implemented and who will be consulted. The growers are worried that decisions are being made without consulting the people who will be directly affected—the farmers themselves.

Mr. Hoon: It is important that the implementation of this decision should be fair and effective, and that it should give all those concerned an opportunity to make the appropriate adjustments to their livelihoods. However, I might have been more persuaded by the hon. Gentleman's observations if he had told me whether he supported the policy in principle.

Mrs. Siân C. James (Swansea, East) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the increased use of coin-operated, unstaffed tanning salons, which are appearing up and down the country? This development was highlighted in an article in The Guardian last week. The advice is that under-16s should not have access to such facilities, yet they are clearly using them in my constituency and in many others. Will my right hon. Friend allow time for a debate on this matter, so that we can discuss ways of protecting children from the threat to their health posed by sunbed abuse?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend raises an important issue—one with which, I confess, I have not had to deal before. However, given the nature of my responsibilities, I get to discuss a range of difficult issues, and I will certainly ensure that whichever Minister is responsible for these matters replies to her.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): When the Leader of the House concedes a debate on the threat to thousands of post offices—as I am sure that he will, given the non-partisan way in which he exercises his office—will he frame its terms broadly enough to include a discussion of the closure of thousands of bank branches? That will enable us to raise the concern of our constituents that 20 per cent. of all bank branches have closed in the past 10 years, and that the promise not to close the last branch in town is being systematically undermined by the stretching of that commitment if, for example, there is a branch in another village four miles away.

Mr. Hoon: It has always been a delight to debate these issues with the hon. Gentleman, because he is what I would call a proper Conservative. He believes in conserving things even in the face of obvious market forces. While the Government have direct responsibility for post office services, that is not so in relation to highly competitive international operations such as our modern clearing banks. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could tell the House how the Conservative party would ensure that rural bank branches remain open. Is he suggesting a subsidy, or some way in which the Government might interfere in the market to provide such facilities? I look forward to hearing his suggestions. In the light of what he has to say, I might be minded to grant a debate on the subject.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend bring the armed forces Minister to the House to explain why the stipulation that the tartan for the new Royal Regiment of Scotland should be produced using traditional high-quality methods has been dropped? That means not only that the standard of the finished article will be compromised but that there is every chance that it will be produced in Poland or Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Hoon: The one thing that I certainly learned from my previous responsibilities was that I should not get involved in matters as sensitive as the question of tartan. I know how important it is, and I recognise its importance to my hon. Friend and to many others from his part of the world. I will ensure that the Minister, who takes an interest in these matters, contacts him accordingly.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): Last autumn, I wrote to the Secretary of State for Health about the crisis in the NHS in my constituency, and asked for a meeting. I was granted a meeting on 1 December, but, just before that day, the meeting was cancelled. It was rearranged for yesterday, but that meeting was subsequently cancelled and another arranged for mid-April. Could we have a debate on the relationship between Ministers and Back Benchers?

Mr. Hoon: I apologise on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I am sure that meetings with Members of Parliament are cancelled only in extreme circumstances. I imagine that the extreme circumstances yesterday involved the fact that the Opposition had tabled two motions for debate on aspects of health care. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not have been happy if my right hon. Friend had chosen to maintain her appointment with him, rather than appearing before the House to take part in the debate. Nevertheless, I am sure that she will rearrange her appointment with the hon. Gentleman. All my ministerial colleagues attach great importance to ensuring that their contacts and relations with Members of the House are of the highest quality, as I know my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State understands.

Sir Peter Soulsby (Leicester, South) (Lab): I welcome the news that the Road Safety Bill is to be given its Second Reading on Wednesday. The Leader of the House may know of the tragic case of 12-year-old Callum Deacon, who was killed in my constituency last June by a driver who, although he had admitted careless driving, received the derisory penalty of a £2,000 fine and a few points on his licence. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that a speedy Commons timetable is intended for the Bill, so that in future drivers guilty of causing death by careless driving face tough and appropriate punishment from the courts?

Mr. Hoon: I am aware of that tragic case. My hon. Friend is right to raise it. The Road Safety Bill will enable Members to debate all the issues relating to road safety, which causes great anxiety to our constituents. I am sure that the specific matter raised by my hon. Friend will be discussed in due course.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): May we have a debate on Ministers' total lack of grip on their private offices? Bashkin Bushaki, who is in Bullingdon prison, was eligible for deportation on 12 December, and the immigration and nationality directorate confirms that the deportation order was sent to the Minister of State's private office early in January. However, the deportation has still not happened, and keeping Bashkin Bushaki here is costing the taxpayer money. If we cannot deport people in prison who want to be deported and are eligible for deportation, what hope is there of deporting anyone in this country who deserves to be deported?

Mr. Hoon: It is obviously important for deportation arrangements to proceed according to law and according to the rules that apply. I am not entirely sure how those in my private office will react to my agreeing with the hon. Gentleman about the need to get a grip on them, but, as a former Minister, the hon. Gentleman will be well aware of the importance of maintaining good relations with one's private office.

Mike Penning (Hemel Hempstead) (Con): On 11 December last year, the largest explosion and fire that Europe has seen since the second world war erupted at the Buncefield oil depot in my constituency. The firemen did a fantastic job, and the Deputy Prime Minister did a fantastic job in co-ordinating measures while the fire was burning. Once it had gone out, however, a plethora of Departments were put in charge of different aspects of the disaster. May we have a debate on how national disasters are dealt with—whether they are natural disasters or industrial disasters like the one at Buncefield—so that we can establish exactly who should be in charge?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has adopted a sensible, careful and practical approach to that terrible tragedy, and I admire the way in which he has represented the interests of his constituents. Each such terrible incident generally turns on the particular facts of the case, and no two national disasters necessarily involve the same issues; but I will consider the hon. Gentleman's suggestion carefully.

Mr. Brooks Newmark (Braintree) (Con): You will be well aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that for quite some time the East Anglian Daily Times has been running a campaign entitled "Save our post offices". The Leader of the House has assured us that the Government support rural post offices, but in my constituency they are being closed year after year. All that we are asking for is a debate on the subject, so that we can agree on whether there is or is not a problem. May we have such a debate?

Mr. Hoon: I have made clear the Government's support for rural postal services, and I have made clear in the context of the specific issue that has been raised why I believe that the Government's policy is right. I am sure that there will be opportunities to debate these matters in due course.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): May I press the point about the future of post office services? I am disappointed by the right hon. Gentleman's apparent reluctance to grant Government time for a debate on the subject. In the past two years 2,500 sub-post offices have closed, five of them in my constituency. This is a serious issue, which is of real concern to communities throughout the country, and the change that the Government have made in the Post Office card account has thrown further doubt on the future of local post office services. We need a debate; may we have one soon, please?

Mr. Hoon: I have referred to the importance of the issue, and to the possibility of a debate in due course. [HON. MEMBERS: "When?"] In the fullness of time.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will fairly recognise that the process of change in relation to the provision of post office facilities in rural areas has been going on for a long time. I will not trade with him the number of closures that took place under the last Conservative Government—although if he continues to press me, I might.

Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): May we have a further debate on the future of ambulance trusts in the United Kingdom? I am particularly interested in the future of the excellent Two Shires Ambulance Trust, which covers Buckinghamshire and Northamptonshire. The consultation period does not end until 25 March, and on many occasions the Prime Minister has assured the House that he will take full account of people's views. Can the Leader of the House explain why posts in the new ambulance trust were advertised in The Sunday Times on 19 January, before the completion of any consultation?

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that that was designed to make clear our commitment to providing ambulance services that are cost-effective and of the high quality that we expect from such a vital emergency service. I assume that the hon. Gentleman supports the Government's approach in wanting high-quality and cost-effective services. We should be united on that particular policy.

Order for Second Reading read.

The Minister for Children and Families (Beverley Hughes): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I hope that we can all welcome the Bill. It was the subject of much debate in the other place, and I think that it has come to us changed for the better. I hope that Members on both sides of the House will be able to support what it offers: much-needed help for children who are often in extremely challenging circumstances, both in this country and abroad.

As I am sure Members will know, every year between 150,000 and 250,000 parental couples separate. One in four of the 12 million children in this country will experience the separation of their parents at some point during their childhood. For every one of those children that separation is a painful and difficult time, and represents the breakdown of their families. It is a difficult time for the parents as well, and we should offer them support; but I firmly believe that our focus should be on the needs of the children, who are often lost in the conflict between the adults.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I welcome what my hon. Friend is saying, but does she accept that one of the huge costs of the separation of parents is often incurred by the children? That burden is increased when one of the separated parents is not allowed access. The Bill makes useful suggestions for strengthening the courts' power to insist that access be granted when it can be granted safely. Would it be possible to arrange through the normal channels for us to have plenty of time on Report to discuss suggestions from Members on both sides of the House on how we might add to the powers of courts to ensure that the needs of children to see both their parents are observed?

Beverley Hughes: I am aware of my right hon. Friend's considerable expertise and commitment to ensuring that our arrangements to deal with those difficult issues for children are the best that we could possibly have. There is a range of potential provisions, only one of which consists of legislation. What we can do before parents go to court, and what we can do in relation to the nature of the decisions that courts make on access and contact, are equally important. However—I am sure that this will be a subject of debate, as it was in the other place, as we go through the detail of the Bill—we would not want any different legal model to compromise the interests and welfare of the child, which are paramount. Having said that, it is our view—this is enshrined in case law—that for most children it will be in their best interests, subject to safety issues, to have continuing contact with both their parents. That is something that we want to facilitate. Indeed, when the Bill was debated in the other place, that was one thing on which both sides were agreed. Children need to have the love, close interest and involvement of both their parents wherever it is safe and in their best interests. We should make every effort to support families in achieving that.

Mr. Field: I thank my right hon. Friend for what she has just said.

Beverley Hughes: I can only thank my right hon. Friend for thanking me. That was a most straightforward intervention. I am grateful to him for those remarks.

I will come to the provisions of the Bill in detail shortly. It is important to remember at the outset that the provisions deal only with the 10 per cent. of separating families who turn to the courts for help in resolving arrangements for contact with children. However, the Bill does not sit in isolation. Just as important is the action that we are taking to help parents to agree a way forward without the need for court intervention if they can.

It will not surprise any hon. Member, all of whom have a great interest in this matter, to hear that parents who agree contact arrangements between themselves, without the courts being involved, tend to be much more satisfied with those arrangements. Therefore, where we can, we want to take steps to help more people to agree their own arrangements without going to court. We have announced a programme of work, including producing new parenting plans to help in working out those arrangements, access to specialist legal advice through a telephone helpline, which is working well, and stronger encouragement towards mediation to help parents to avoid the need for a court-based solution.

As we know, however much success we have with those arrangements, there will always be a minority of cases where people need to turn to the courts for help. Those will be the most difficult, most emotionally harrowing and most highly contested cases. They will be the cases that probably will not resolve themselves if left to continue and where the ongoing conflict could risk harm to the welfare of the child or children involved. Where the court is called upon, we must ensure that the intervention does not entrench the conflict any further, but offers a positive way forward for everyone, and most of all that the court proceedings and the solution remain uncompromisingly focused on the needs of the child or children.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend knows, in the most difficult cases, the court will make orders for supervised contact, or contact at contact centres, yet there is a woeful lack of those. As this issue moves forward, particularly when she comes back to the detail, will she look at that matter? In Northamptonshire, for a variety of complicated reasons, there has been low take-up at the centre that serves that area. In my town of Northampton, all the contact centres are provided on a voluntary basis. It is important in these difficult cases that there is proper provision for safe, supervised contact, and safe contact centres.

Beverley Hughes: I agree. We need to think creatively about how we can extend provision both for unsupervised and supervised contact centres. The Government have already put considerable resources into that. Since 2000, some £5.3 million has gone to the sector, and in the last spending review a further £2.4 million was provided to develop 14 new centres for supervised contact in England. There will be a further sum totalling £7.5 million for 2006–08 to support that. The development of extended services in schools and children centres offer us enormously creative possibilities for contact to take place, probably non-supervised contact. I have already been to children centres that are being used for non-supervised contact and access. We need to ensure that we use those facilities to the full for the benefit of parents.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): In my constituency, we have some contact centres that are run by the voluntary sector. They have some funding but are worried that the funding is drying up and will be moved away to Government-funded centres.

Beverley Hughes: That is not the case. Much of the money that I mentioned is going to the local level. Contact centres for supervised access that are run and managed by voluntary agencies have a great role to play. It is not the case that that money is simply for Government or local authority-run centres. By and large, they are run in partnership with voluntary agencies. We want that to continue because they have great expertise. Many parents find the concept of supervised contact undertaken by a voluntary agency more palatable than the concept of supervised contact at a centre run by a local authority or by the Government.

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that many of the contact centres that have received Government funding come within the ambit of the national charity for contact centres but that some fall outside that, are still run by the voluntary sector and are not receiving the investment to which she referred? Will she examine that matter to ensure that all contact centres have the same high-quality supervision and training for staff? My contact centre in Luton is run by the WRVS, and very good it is too, but I fear that some contact centres simply do not have the quality of staff and training that are desperately needed in such difficult circumstances.

Beverley Hughes: I take my hon. Friend's point. The role that staff play in those situations, particularly for supervised contact, can be critical for the parents and children concerned. It is very important that they are as high quality as we can make them. I will certainly look at that matter.

Where the court is involved, we have to ensure that whatever intervention we make does not entrench conflicts any further. The Bill will be critical in achieving that and in maintaining the focus on the child. It offers the court new powers to facilitate contact, and to enforce contact when that becomes necessary.

Clause 1 offers the court the power to direct parties to participate in "contact activities", ranging from parenting classes to domestic violence perpetrator programmes, and explicitly including the power to require attendance at an information session with a mediator to explore the benefits of mediation. We believe that those activities will help parents to begin to face up to the difficulties, and the conflict, behind their disagreement over contact arrangements. That can be key to helping the court to reach a resolution without the need for fully contested proceedings.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Clearly, the ability to refer to such groups is valuable and can help in the most difficult cases, but I am far from sure that the resources are currently available at most courts for such projects. How will the Department go about finding what is out there already and ensuring that the gaps are plugged, so that, for example, domestic violence perpetrator programmes will be available at literally every court if they are needed?

Beverley Hughes: My hon. and learned Friend raises an important point that we are considering actively. We are piloting various forms of activity to which we think that we can direct parents. We are trying to promote through local authorities the provision of parenting classes. We accept that the support parents need when they are separating is rather different from the support that they may need when they are not separating but trying to cope with the behaviour of their children. We are looking with local authorities at the availability of what is likely to be required and trying to ensure that, when courts wish those activities to take place, they will be available. That involves a variety of local agencies, including local authorities and the probation service.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): I listened very carefully to the right hon. Lady's opening remarks and the lesson to be learned from the lack of success—I will not say failure—of the family resolutions pilots is surely that without an element of compulsion, the desired objectives simply will not achieved. Such an approach will not work on a voluntary basis alone.

Beverley Hughes: The hon. Gentleman raises a fundamental point. The model and culture in this country has been based on the understanding that unless people come willingly to the table to participate in sensitive activities such as mediation, they almost certainly will not work. But he is right to draw attention to the fact that we want to encourage as many people as possible to avail themselves of the undoubted benefits that voluntary dispute resolution practices can bring to separating parents.

As the hon. Gentleman may know, we have published today the evaluations of the family resolutions pilot project to which he refers, and of the in-court conciliation project. Although the findings are, as he suggests, mixed, both projects have provided very important information on what parents value and find helpful, and on what works well and what does not. In both projects, certain approaches demonstrated good success rates in helping parents to reach consensus and to avoid further dispute in court. We all know how important that is to outcomes for children. So although the results are mixed, we will take the positive findings and try to build them into further development of voluntary dispute resolution. But forcing people down that road is a very serious step that is likely to be counterproductive. As I said earlier, we are making it possible for courts, through directed activity, to insist on a session with a mediator to explore the benefits of mediation, but it would be a step too far to force people to participate in mediation itself.

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): Did I hear the Minister say that she is publishing today the findings of the family resolutions pilot and if so, would it not have been slightly more helpful to have had them ahead of this debate, particularly given that the project finished last September? I accept that the best form of mediation is that to which people come willingly; otherwise, it does not really work. But where one party fully embraces the mediation route, the other flatly refuses it and the case therefore goes to court, what is the penalty against the person who has decided not to participate, or the reward for the person who has gone along with the court's wishes?

Beverley Hughes: Although the project finished a few months ago, we received the evaluations only very recently. Indeed, I understand that the original date of publication was the end of March, so we have been able to bring it forward to coincide with today's debate; but it was not possible, given the original timetable, to publish beforehand. [Interruption.] I understand that the evaluations have been published today on the departmental website and are available. After the debate, I shall clarify for the hon. Gentleman's benefit precisely where he can find them.

Tim Loughton: That is not very helpful to the House. If the Minister thinks that vital information that is germane to this Bill may be available on her Department's website, she should, at the very least, out of courtesy and respect to those participating in this debate, have ensured that Front Benchers were notified that the document was available before we made our submissions to this debate. Would that not have been common courtesy?

Beverley Hughes: I agree that the hon. Gentleman should have received those evaluations, and it was our expectation that he would. I apologise and I shall certainly pursue the matter, because I accept that he should have received them.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): May I endorse the point made by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton)? I certainly have not received notification of the evaluations' publication; indeed, I did intend to ask the Minister about them in my speech.

Beverley Hughes: I apologise to the hon. Lady, as well, and I shall certainly investigate the reason why the evaluations were not sent directly to her.

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Would it not help the good conduct of our deliberations if somebody printed off copies of those important documents, so that Members can read them before they participate in the debate? Surely that would make for a better debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. While I can well understand hon. Members' desire to see those reports, it is outside the remit of the Chair to make that order. But I understand the point being made.

Beverley Hughes: I accept the general point being made and as I said, the documents have been published on the departmental website today, some four weeks in advance of when we expected to publish them. They are important and they will prove particularly important in Committee, where we will discuss the detail of what works and what does not. But as I said, I shall investigate why the Opposition spokespeople were not sent copies, which they should have been.

As I said, both pilot projects are important in helping us to understand what works best for parents in avoiding the need to go to court. Where a court order does prove necessary, clause 2 offers a new power to ask the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service to monitor that order and to make sure that it is followed. If it is not, the court will hear about it. As many Members know from the experience of their constituents, in some cases, after the long and difficult process of a court dispute, a contact order is made only for it to be ignored. We have all heard sad stories of non-resident parents being unable to spend any time with their children, despite such contact having been directed by a court order, which is often obtained only after considerable struggle. We also know of cases where a non-resident parent is not complying with a contact order by not providing the contact that their children may well greatly need.

Courts often find themselves with no realistic way to deal with this problem. The only sanction at their disposal is to hold the person breaching a contact order in contempt, leading to a fine or committal to prison, but they are understandably reluctant to do that because of the impact on the child concerned. The courts have told us that they need broader powers to address this problem realistically, and to respond to the circumstances of particular cases. In 2002, a committee chaired by Lord Justice Wall produced a report entitled "Making Contact Work", which called for these powers. The Bill responds to the recommendations made in that report.

In addition to providing the ability to require participation in contact activities, clauses 4 and 5 provide new powers to respond to breaches of contact orders, in line with the recommendations in "Making Contact Work".

Annette Brooke: Will the Minister clarify the following point, which I may not have understood fully? On enforcement of a contact order and the imposing of a subsequent penalty, community programme-based punishments have a slight drawback, in that they might not be in the best interests of the child. Can such punishments be imposed under the terms of the Bill, and are they in fact permissible?

Beverley Hughes: The hon. Lady is to some extent confusing contact activities with the responses that a court can make to breaches of contact orders, such as requiring unpaid community work of some kind. Clause 1 deals with activities that can be directed, but which are intended specifically to facilitate compliance with a contact order prior to that point.

Clauses 4 and 5 will give the courts access to enforcement orders, allowing them to direct those in breach of an order to undertake unpaid work. They will allow the courts to order compensation to be paid from one parent to another in circumstances where the breach of an order causes genuine financial loss. One example is the cost of a holiday that had been planned with the child concerned.

Tim Loughton: I have two questions for the Minister. First, how many breaches of contact orders have resulted in the penalty of contempt of court, which she says the courts are reluctant to use? Secondly, the Minister said that a financial penalty is proposed to replace contempt of court, but what will happen when a parent with custody who is on benefits and relies on maintenance payments from a former partner is not able to pay that penalty? Will the proposed penalty be in the best interests of children who rely on maintenance payments to meet their basic living costs?

Beverley Hughes: I do not have the figures to answer the hon. Gentleman's first question, but I shall give them to him after this debate. On his second question, we are proposing not a financial penalty, but a means of redress for parents who can demonstrate that they have paid out money to have contact with a child in respect of a special arrangement that has subsequently been aborted by the non-compliance of the other parent. It is important to describe that as a financial loss rather than a financial penalty. We are not proposing what might be called a fine, but that a financial loss can be repaid. All the circumstances under which compensation orders are made will be taken into account by the court, and that will include the direct or indirect impact on the child. We believe that the provisions will give the court greater flexibility in dealing with those who fail to comply with contact orders—a flexibility that the courts have told us that they genuinely and urgently need.

Tim Loughton: I am grateful to the Minister for giving away again, but we need to tease out some detail, although I am sure that we will do so in Committee. It does not really matter whether we call this proposal a fine, a penalty or compensation. Let us say that a parent with custody has frustrated a contact order with the result, for example, that a holiday with the non-resident parent costing £500 is aborted. The Minister has suggested that, in those circumstances, the court would direct the parent with custody to pay compensation of £500. However, what will be the penalty if that parent relies on maintenance or is on benefit and cannot afford to pay? What is the next stage of the process?

Beverley Hughes: The court will consider all the circumstances of each case. If a compensation order for a certain amount of money is made, the court will take account of the ability of the non-resident parent, in the case set out by the hon. Gentleman, to pay the money. The court will put the arrangements in the compensation order. If the money is subsequently paid, the court will reconsider the matter and decide what action to take. It will look at all the circumstances in the round, including whether the contact order has subsequently been complied with in full. The details of each case are for the court to decide.

The provisions in this part of the Bill have been asked for by the courts. They want the flexibility that will allow them to act against those who breach contact orders, without that having a disproportionate effect on the child. We all understand how important that is. When they make contact orders, the courts have a single guiding principle in mind—that the welfare of the child is paramount. That principle is set out in section 1 of the Children Act 1989. It underpins all our policy and is the foundation of this Bill.

Ms Keeble: When assessments for contact orders are made or breaches of contact considered, will my right hon. Friend the Minister say—either now or later—what attention will be paid to domestic violence? Such violence affects 66 per cent. of all CAFCASS cases, and parents with care often breach contact orders because they are worried about a child's safety in the care of a violent former partner.

Beverley Hughes: I hope that my hon. Friend will bear with me, as I shall come to that important point in a moment. It was raised in the other place, and I am sure that it will be the subject of detailed discussion in Committee.

Vera Baird: My hon. Friend the Minister is very generous in giving way, although I think that she is getting bored, so I will not bother again after this intervention. In connection with enforcement, is it possible that people found to have denied an ordered contact without a reasonable excuse could be required to allow compensating contact? Such an approach might be suitable when the person involved is short of money, and would give the deprived parent an extra allotment of time with the child. That approach has some good points, although it contains the curious notion that one parent can be punished by giving the child to the other. Is that an idea that merits further reflection?

Beverley Hughes: My hon. and learned Friend will know better than I that the courts already have the power to vary the amount of contact, so the option that she sets out is available to them in principle as things stand. However, the courts must decide what is in the best interests of the child, without using that child as a reward for one parent and a punishment for the other. The risk is that compensatory contact could be seen to be used in that way, and that is something that I am sure that we would all want to avoid.

When a court, with the principle of the paramountcy of the child in mind, makes an order for contact, that order should be followed for the sake of the child. The court should be able to act if it is not. Much of the debate on the Bill in the other place centred on whether any change should be made to the paramountcy principle—whether we should be more specific and say that the child's welfare is normally best served through contact with both parents, or whether we should specify that contact should never be ordered until the court has first satisfied itself that it is safe.

The Government believe that both of those positions are well intentioned. They stem from concern that the right outcome for children is not always achieved, and that the law should be more specific about what the best outcome is. However, were we to accept either position, we would irrevocably compromise the clear statement in the Children Act 1989—that, in any case, the court must do whatever is best for the welfare of that individual child. It should not have to make an assumption, independently of the facts, about what is best for the child, and then be forced to row back if that assumption turns out to be wrong. The court should look at the circumstances of the case, think about the child, and make its decision.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: I agree with most of what the Minister has said, but I have read the Hansard report of the debate in the other place with great care. Neither my noble Friend Baroness Morris of Bolton nor the Liberal Democrat Baroness Sharp of Guildford made any concession in respect of the paramountcy principle, so perhaps the Minister should revise her views on the matter.

Beverley Hughes: The point of view that I set out certainly was expressed in the other place, and that may happen again when we discuss the Bill in Committee, although it is worth noting that the House of Lords as a whole did not vote to overturn the paramountcy principle and insert a presumption of contact.

In respect of a court making a decision on the basis of the principle that the welfare of the child is paramount, it should have as full a range of options as possible to deal with the case in a way that best serves the child. That is what part 1 of the Bill offers. Of course, in making its response, the court must be fully informed about the circumstances of a case. As has been noted already, the question of domestic violence is often raised in disputes about contact, and it has been argued that courts are not always sufficiently aware of it when making their decisions. We take that very seriously, and a great deal of work has been done across Government to try to address the damage that domestic violence can do to everyone whom it affects—including, in some instances, children.

There are some vital safeguards already in legislation, such as the requirement in the welfare checklist in the Children Act 1989 for the courts to have regard to any harm that the child has suffered or is at risk of suffering. However, we were persuaded in debate in the other place that something further was needed. What is now clause 7 of the Bill places a new and specific duty on CAFCASS to carry out a risk assessment and inform the court of the result whenever it is involved in private law Children Act 1989 proceedings and it has cause to suspect that the child concerned is at risk of harm, including harm as a result of witnessing harm to another.

I have no doubt that we will return to the issue of domestic violence during our debate today and later, but I believe that the addition of clause 7 represents an important change.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): May I take the Minister back to clause 4? I am not clear in my own mind. Let us say that a parent with custody denies contact that has been ordered by a court, and an enforcement order is then imposed which the parent with custody fulfils. What happens if the parent with custody continues to deny contact? She may fulfil the unpaid community work requirement and continue to deny custody. What will happen then?

Beverley Hughes: Those cases would come back to court and it would be up to the court to decide what further action needed to be taken. Clearly, it would not be right for those circumstances to persist—for non-compliance with a contact order to have taken place, for an order to have been made to do community work, for the community work order to be complied with, but for non-compliance to continue on the contact. The court would have to decide what further action it wanted to take to ensure compliance with the contact order because that would be the primary objective in those circumstances. The community work option gives the courts another element of flexibility in their response, but the objective is to obtain compliance with the contact order.

Ms Keeble: Having had a look at clause 7, may I ask whether those considerations would also apply to breaches of contact orders? People often say that they have breached a contact order because they are concerned about what they have seen happening to the child and they have difficulty in using the process. Will the clause help them?

Beverley Hughes: I believe that it will, and for this reason specifically. I am aware that some women find it difficult to reveal at the start of proceedings that there has been harm to them through domestic violence. The gateway process now makes it more straightforward and prompts people to reveal that there has been domestic violence by means of a tick box. If they tick it they go straight to a CAFCASS member of staff. My hon. Friend should also bear in mind the option for CAFCASS to undertake a risk assessment not only if harm has been declared by a party to the proceedings, but if it suspects from its dealings with a family that there has been harm through domestic violence. CAFCASS can undertake that risk assessment at any point in the proceedings, including after enforcement order proceedings have started. There is no limit on when CAFCASS, if it has concerns, can undertake a risk assessment and make that and its judgment on the issue available to the court.

Vera Baird: Of course, that would be the ordinary thing to do, but I do not think that the Bill requires that a risk assessment, initiated perhaps by CAFCASS, be reported to the court. Although it may sound an excessive requirement, is it not better to ensure that risk assessments, whether positive or negative, always find their way to the court by including in the Bill a duty for CAFCASS to report them?

Is my right hon. Friend totally confident that CAFCASS can meet its obligations to do such risk assessments? I have read the thematic review prepared, I think, by the inspectorate of court administration last year, which said:

"There is a worrying lack of attention to safety planning in almost all the observed sessions", when commenting on CAFCASS.

Beverley Hughes: My hon. and learned Friend distinguishes two points. There is a requirement that the risk assessment, if undertaken by CAFCASS, be brought to the attention of the court. She questions whether the court takes sufficient account of that. The court is bound to take account of all the information that is germane to the proceedings. I point my hon. and learned Friend to the important judgment at the end of November by Lord Justice Wall on a case in the Court of Appeal. He felt that the judge had failed to follow the guidelines in relation to that particular issue. He took the rather strong step of attaching the guidelines to his judgment. In so doing, he said:

"I append them to this judgement in the hope that this court will not again be presented with a case such as the present, which not only ill-serves the parties and the child, but does the system discredit, and helps to devalue the valuable and conscientious work which courts up and down the country are undertaking in an attempt to tackle the scourge of domestic violence and to minimise the effect it has on parties and children."

That sends a strong signal to judges and courts that they have to take the issue seriously and demonstrate that they do. I certainly believe that when CAFCASS presents a risk assessment to courts, the onus on the courts, underlined by that judgment, is to demonstrate that they have taken it into account seriously.

My hon. and learned Friend raises the capacity of CAFCASS. It is a developing issue. We have applied increased resources to CAFCASS and will do so next year. I am confident from that point of view, but also from that of its own desire to ensure that the issue of domestic violence comes squarely into the arena when it is appropriate. CAFCASS is charged as the organisation to make sure that that happens.

I will come now to part 2 of the Bill. It addresses a different, but no less vulnerable, group of children—those who are adopted across national borders by individuals in this country. This will often be in the most extreme of circumstances, as a last resort where the child has no chance of a happy or safe family life in their own country. Part 2 contains a number of important measures to help safeguard those children and to improve the procedures around inter-country adoption.

First, and critically, clauses 9 to 12 provide a statutory framework for the suspension of inter-country adoptions from a specified country where there are concerns about the adoption process in that country. Those would be serious concerns, such as child trafficking, and a rigorous assessment of evidence would always be undertaken before taking the step of suspending adoptions. There is a real need for this power. In 2004, my predecessor as Minister for Children suspended adoptions from Cambodia, as hon. Members will know, in response to evidence of problems with the adoption process. She did this using prerogative powers, but I hope that Members on all sides of the House will recognise the importance of a clear statutory process for us to respond to such circumstances in future.

Clause 13 provides a power for the Secretary of State to charge to meet the costs of the administration of inter-country adoption casework. That proposal was the subject of some debate in another place, but it was acknowledged that this was a matter of prioritising. With limited funds available, it is vital that we target them at front-line services for vulnerable children in this country, and asking those who can afford it to meet a proportionately small charge is, in my view, reasonable in the context of wider priorities for public spending.

Finally, clause 14 makes further important provisions around the process of inter-country adoption. It amends section 83 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 to make it harder to circumvent restrictions on bringing children into the UK. Section 83 currently states that where an external adoption order was effected less than six months before the child is brought into the UK, the adopter must meet certain conditions, such as being assessed and approved by an adoption agency. These restrictions are being circumvented, in some cases, by UK residents adopting the children and then leaving them in the care of a person in the other country until six months has passed so that they do not have to meet those conditions. The Bill will, rightly, make it harder for people to circumvent those restrictions by extending the time limit in such cases from six months to 12. Clause 14 also clarifies that certain children brought into the UK for adoption are not also privately fostered children. That will prevent an overlap of functions for local authorities.

Ms Keeble: I have pressed my right hon. Friend often on the private fostering of children, in particular those brought from Africa. I had not picked up the exact implications of clause 14, so I hope that she can say more about its impact on protecting the welfare of such children.

Beverley Hughes: I know that the issue is of great concern to my hon. Friend, and I share that concern, but she is straying on to the important issue of the regulation of private foster carers, which was considered during the passage of the Children Act 2004, which strengthened the notification scheme. A sunset provision was included, so that in the event that the notification scheme does not produce the desired results, we can introduce a registration scheme. My hon. Friend knows that we are actively monitoring the impact of the notification scheme and will come to a decision on its effectiveness. It is an important issue.

Taken as a whole, the Bill offers an improvement in life chances to some of the most vulnerable children in our society and elsewhere. It carries on our commitment to improving outcomes for children based on their individual needs, founded on the principle that whatever the situation, and however severe the conflict between adults, we must put the children first. While there are some contentious issues about precisely how we approach that—in such an emotional area, it would be strange if there were not —I believe that that principle unites the House. We all agree that the needs of children should be paramount, and that that should be the standard to which we hold any change we consider to children's legislation. The Bill has been prepared with that principle firmly in mind and will give children facing extremely challenging circumstances a better chance of positive outcomes during their childhood and in later life. I commend it to the House.

1.12 pm

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): This is yet another Bill with "children" in the title, and is not to be confused with the Adoption and Children Act 2002, the Children Act 2004 or the Children Act 1989. I wish that we could find different titles for Bills, as I have suggested in Committee before now, because it is so confusing. Perhaps we can address that point when we cover the short title in Committee.

This is an important Bill that addresses an important problem. I must first say how disappointed I am with the programme motion, which provides only two days in Committee. My understanding was that we would have four days, or eight sessions.

Beverley Hughes: It is my understanding that the programme motion was agreed through the usual channels. Ministers are relaxed about how much time the Bill should have in Committee.

Tim Loughton: There must have been some confusion, because the understanding of our Whips was for four days. I hope that the confusion can be cleared up and, given the constructive spirit in which we have dealt with other legislation involving the Minister, I hope that we can change the motion. Two days for a complex Bill—although it is short, it is complex, especially in clause 1—is a short time, and we will have several amendments to table and debate.

The Bill has been a long time coming. We have waited patiently for it since it finished its passage through the other place on 14 November, almost four months ago. It is more than six months since it started its passage there on 29 June. Why has it taken so long, especially as the Bill has changed little since it was originally presented? It was preceded by the parental separation Green Paper in July 2004, the next steps progress report in January 2005, the draft Bill and the pre-legislative scrutiny committee, and there is some mystery about why it has taken so long to progress.

We are also disappointed that, although the Government have recognised in introducing the Bill that this serious issue needs tackling, it will fail to provide effective and lasting solutions to the problems that the Minister outlined. I have some questions about who is running the legislation, given the history of turf wars between the Department for Constitutional Affairs and the Department for Education and Skills on the early interventions project and others. The cross-departmental responsibilities of the Minister for Children and Families are being tested in this case, because it is no secret that Departments have dissented on the early interventions project.

I do not wish to break the consensus of wishing the best for children—which we all do—but the Bill is a limp fudge that lacks teeth and relies on a court infrastructure that is already creaking under its workload. It is at full stretch, as the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) suggested. In short, we have some severe reservations about the Bill and will seek to amend it substantially.

It was worrying that, in response to some of the detailed questions that we tried to put to the Minister about how the breaking of contact orders and compensation may work, she kept saying that it was a matter for the courts to decide. That is true, but the introduction of the Bill is a recognition of the existence of a problem, and the courts need to have a much stronger steer on how to use some of the mechanisms that will be introduced to deal with that problem. I hope that in Committee she will not keep falling back on the mantra that it is up to the courts to decide. Of course the courts must decide in individual cases, but they need a strong steer on what the legislation is intended to achieve. That is why we need the detail on how compensatory contact might work, if that is to be one of the measures available.

Vera Baird: I am anxious to probe what the hon. Gentleman means and what sort of strong steer he thinks should be given. Surely the judge will have powers under the Bill to apply appropriately in each case, given its individual complexities and his training, background and experience. What more guidance can the hon. Gentleman offer to the judiciary?

Tim Loughton: The hon. and learned Lady has already mentioned contempt of court, which is one penalty that can be applied at the moment, but the courts are reluctant to use it. The measures in the Bill include penalties for breaches of contact and we need to have clearly set out the expectations as to how those penalties will be escalated if breaches continue to occur. If the Minister says it is up to the courts, the position will remain confused and that is why we need to tease out more detail on that issue in Committee.

Vera Baird: I hope that the hon. Gentleman finds this attempt to clarify the questions as helpful as I do. If my right hon. Friend the Minister produced the record, I suspect that, although we would find that few courts had actually sent parents with primary care to prison, there are probably more cases where they use that threat. Indeed, the district judges who tell people that if they do not comply they will have to bring their toothbrush with them when they next come to court show that the threat is used. Surely the point of the legislation is to remove that dilemma for the courts, because it is bad for a child if their primary carer is sent to prison. There is a raft of different measures, so in what sense is the Bill failing to deal with the problem?

Tim Loughton: I agree that the worst outcome for the parent, and especially for children, is for the parent to end up in prison, which is certainly not something we want. That is why it is essential that there is a scale of penalties with a realistic expectation of imposition. The hon. and learned Lady rightly says that few people, if any, go to prison, so if the threat of that penalty is never actually carried out, it is not much of a threat. I was trying to tease out whether the details of the scale of penalties that the Bill sets out, and which we want to be better set out, will be imposed by the courts if necessary. A threat can only be any good if it is realistic and credible, and somebody believes it will be carried out.

Ms Keeble: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that some of us welcome the provision precisely because we have had to take up cases of constituents who have been utterly terrified by being told in court that they will be sent down for not letting a violent ex-partner have contact with their child? The courts are used to dealing with people who get into debt or who have financial liabilities, even though they are on benefits and can make repayments only at a low rate. It is perfectly possible for the courts to deal with such cases without their being set out in the Bill. The provisions are a welcome alternative to sending women down for refusing contact to violent ex-partners.

Tim Loughton: If there is a threat of violence to an ex-partner and his or her children, I entirely agree that a breach of contact may be justifiable and the Bill makes provision for that—it is a matter on which the court must be satisfied. The Bill also includes clause 7 on risk assessments, which we welcome, and which will provide clearer evidence of the strength of the risk. However, unless the risk is proven—unless the case is put—the assumption should still be that a contact order granted by a court should be adhered to and it is up to the person who has breached the order to prove why he or she was justified in doing so. If not, and if the risk assessment does not show that there has been a threat of violence, the penalties should be invoked. I am not in any way trying to put at any more risk someone who is at threat from violence, or indeed, his or her children, but the person who uses that excuse with no vindication must realise that there are realistic penalties that will be enforced.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): Clause 7, the risk assessment provision, is one of the most crucial and difficult parts of the Bill. If the hon. Gentleman has concerns about it, will he explore how it could be made more waterproof?

Tim Loughton: I have no concerns about clause 7. That is the point that I have just made. I said that including provision for risk assessments gives greater security. People who have serious concerns about domestic violence can have them taken into account by the court so that a breach of contact would be justified. I think that the hon. Lady slightly misheard what I said. The risk assessment gives greater security, but if it showed that a person was not at risk, the penalties should be enforced if there was a breach of contact.

Vera Baird rose—

Tim Loughton: I had better make some progress, otherwise I shall speak for even longer than the Minister, which will get me into great trouble—[Interruption.] I am not criticising her. She generously took many interventions and I am not trying to be churlish. We are having a nice debate. You try to be nice and you get it thrown back at you, Madam Deputy Speaker—you cannot win.

We are determined that the problem of breach of contact should be addressed once and for all, which is why we have done a lot of work to highlight it, through summits held at Westminster, amendments that we proposed to the Children Act 2004 and some key undertakings on contact provisions in our manifesto for the 2005 general election. When we scrutinise the Bill in Committee, we shall maintain the resolute and principled stance taken on the subject of contact in particular by those doughty fighters in the Lords for the interests of children, my noble Friends Earl Howe and Baroness Morris of Bolton.

The Bill addresses two major but unrelated issues in respect of contact orders in part 1 and adoptions with a foreign element in part 2, as the Minister said. Although we have some concerns about the fashioning of new procedures for overseas adoption, there is a fair degree of agreement in principle, so we shall concentrate our fire, and our time, on the woeful inadequacies of some of the contact provisions.

Let us consider the problem. Up to 200,000 children a year experience the emotional distress of their parents' separation or divorce. That experience is likely to befall 20 per cent. of children before they reach the age of 16—the same experience affected me when I was 11. Members of Parliament are probably not good role models for parents trying to promote stable families. My noble Friend Baroness Morris said that if she was the subject of a CAFCASS report, she would be described thus:

> "Works away from home, involving long and anti-social hours; appears more interested in everyone else's children than her own; and spends long, hot, summer week-ends indoors writing speeches."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 29 June 2005; Vol. 673, c. 255.]

Not a very good model for stable family life.

Although 90 per cent. of separations are resolved without resorting to dispute in the courts, the remaining 10 per cent. can end up in protracted, messy and acrimonious legal proceedings, as the Minister said. There is much work for CAFCASS to do in producing 28,000 or so contact orders and writing 33,000 court reports, and we have concerns about its resource capability to cope with that work load, while acknowledging the improvements that we are beginning to see under the new board, which, with Baroness Pitkeathley and the new chief executive Anthony Douglas, is doing a good job after a traumatic first few years due to the Government's poorly thought-through conception of CAFCASS in April 2001.

From our surgeries, we are all aware of the pain of non-resident parents who are denied meaningful contact with their children and who often live in reduced circumstances that militate against proper relationships with the children. We see cases of multiple breaches of contact orders by the parent with custody, which require multiple and costly returns to court by the non-resident parent. There are horrendous cases of members of the extended family being shut out of the lives of children—especially grandchildren. I stress the important role played by grandparents who feel so much pain when splits go wrong. Grandparents who have given family members great support, acting as chauffeurs, babysitters and bankers, suddenly find after a split that they are left completely out of the equation.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I can reinforce the hon. Gentleman's last point. Is it his experience, as it is mine, that many grandparents come to MPs' surgeries for advice because they are so completely shut out of the process?

Tim Loughton: The hon. Gentleman is right. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) held a debate on that very subject in Westminster Hall recently. Just this morning, I heard that a loving grandmother in my constituency, whom I know well, and who has not seen her grandchildren for the best part of 10 years, is in hospital due to the stress caused by that. It is unacceptable that extended family members are just as much victims—even more so—as the people directly involved.

The number of contact orders does not reflect the amount of contact that is given. We hear the complaint that the contact simply consists of passing on postcards or a Christmas or birthday card, and nothing happens face to face. I fear that the contact often takes place at rather soulless and anonymous contact centres, although I acknowledge that some of the voluntary organisations in particular do a very good job in that respect. I am pleased to hear the Minister mention the greater use of family centres and some of the other new measures that will provide a family-oriented environment, because such places can be depressing and certainly not conducive to allowing the absent parent to spend good-quality time with his or her children.

Too often, the parent with custody can use the children as pawns in an ongoing fight against an ex-partner by taking children away when a holiday has been booked, by denying ex-partners access to school reports or school photographs or by moving to the other end of the country, well away from where the ex-partner lives or can visit because of work commitments. None of that is helpful to children, and there are some extreme cases of people who serially frustrate contact orders and seem to get away with it, time and again—hence my concern that any threat against the infringement of contact must be realistic and able to be brought into play.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: Will my hon. Friend comment on the practice that obtains in respect of the existing statutory duty under section 23 of the Children Act 1989, which places a statutory duty on local authorities to consider friends and family first when considering care orders and court orders but is being disregarded in practice by most local authorities?

Tim Loughton: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. We have heard a number of stories where members of extended families and close family friends could effectively step in, in loco parentis, and offer an opportunity, perhaps temporarily, for a stable family upbringing for those children, who are ignored from the equation. In many cases, that is down to the pressure on local authorities but, in too many cases, local authorities do not think that that should be first port of call, although they are obliged to do so. Time and again, when contact orders are frustrated, it causes stress and anguish for parents and an increase in mental illness problems. We are all aware that 40 per cent. of non-resident parents lose contact with their children within two years of a family split. That is the most alarming figure of all.

Ms Dari Taylor: Does the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that not all contact is effective and nor does it produce a stable outcome? There are relationships in every family unit that cause serious problems—a fact that becomes apparent in my surgery, time and again. Does he also accept that, in vexatious situations and when there has been domestic violence, unsupervised contact can often be very undermining to the development of a stable family unit? We can talk about contact and understand its value but we must also put in place controls if those children are to benefit from the stability of relationships.

Tim Loughton: The hon. Lady is right, and I will come in a minute, if I can, to the presumption that the child will benefit from maximising contact with both of his or her parents, as the Minister has said already. In some cases, that is not the norm, which is when special provisions need to be made. We want a presumption that that will be appropriate for most children, but there are certainly cases of domestic violence where contact with a non-resident parent can be counter-productive and where proper supervised contact may be needed—it is a case of horses for courses—but that is not necessary in the majority of cases.

Mr. Pickles: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Tim Loughton: I am trying to make progress, but I will give way.

Mr. Pickles: My hon. Friend is making some very good points, and he should not be upset that we interrupt him because we want further information from him. My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) made a point about other family members who could be involved, but I have noticed the corrosive effect of the secrecy of the courts on social workers. There is a rather patrician view that they do not need to explain their reasons for taking decisions about the placement of children. Does my hon. Friend share my concern?

Tim Loughton: My hon. Friend makes a very good point, and I shall briefly refer to a call for greater transparency in the court system, as that would go some way to address people's concerns about what may be going on. Decisions may be made for perfectly good reasons, but they are not explained properly and can then be misinterpreted and subject to all sorts of other problems. I will mention that in a minute.

Too many contact orders are breached, which is not good for the parents and the extended family, but, above all, it is not good for the children themselves. Everything we do in our approach to the Bill, as with all other children's legislation, will be guided by the principle that the welfare of the children is paramount, which is set out in the Children Act 1989 and is still relevant today.

What are we trying to do with the Bill? It is in everyone's interests to promote stable family life and, wherever possible, to maximise the amount of meaningful quality time spent with both parents, whether or not they are living together. However, it is not a question of the rights of parents to have access to their children, but rather that the child has a right of maximum access to his or her parents, unless there is an overwhelming case that doing so would be harmful to that child.

The best blend of both parents is what we need to achieve. It is rarely, if ever, the fault of a child that his or her parents separate, and children should not suffer even more as a result by not having equal access to both parents. Surely, that was the principle set out by Ministers in the Green Paper, which said:

"After separation, both parents should have responsibility for, and a meaningful relationship with, their children, so long as it is safe. This is the view of most people in our society."

In the debate in the upper House, Lord Adonis said:

"We fully support the position established in case law that children normally benefit from a meaningful relationship with both parents following separation, so long as it is safe".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 29 June 2005; Vol. 673, c. 251.]

We entirely agree. Parents do not stop being parents simply because they are no longer partners.

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that meaningful access does not necessarily mean equal access?

Tim Loughton: Yes, I do.

There is much research to support the greater role of fathers in the lives of the children and the benefit that that brings to the child. Figures on the amount of time that fathers spend with their children reflect our country's social development. Compared with 30 years ago, men spend eight times as much time with their children. In the 1970s, the fathers of young children spent less than a quarter of an hour a day involved in child-related activities. Recent surveys show that, on average, the fathers of under-fives now spend an hour and 20 minutes on child care activities during the week. Our society has changed greatly over the past 20 or 30 years, as has the relationship that female and male parents have with their children.

Research overwhelmingly highlights the fact that children whose fathers have been actively involved in their children's lives achieve more academically, have more satisfying relationships in their adult lives and are less likely to get into trouble with the police. Indeed, if fathers are involved, children are less likely to have a criminal record by the age of 21. Pre-school children who spend more time playing with their dads are often more sociable when they enter nursery school. Children benefit equally, if not more, from their mothers, but I am making the point that both parents have an equal role to play and can have an equally beneficial effect on their children by maximising such contact where it is appropriate to do so.

The Government need to do more to enable both parents to play an active role in the upbringing of their children, yet there is a cohort of dejected non-resident parents—predominantly, but not exclusively, fathers—who are being prevented from doing so often unfamiliarly and without good reason. That does not diminish in any way the fact that there are some very difficult non-resident parents, particularly fathers, who may have threatened violence and may have a detrimental effect on children, but they are the minority.

We will table amendments to the Bill that maintain:

"that the court shall, unless a contrary reasons be shown, act on the presumption that a child's welfare is best served through residence with his parents and, if his parents are not living together, through residence with one of them and through both of them being as fully and equally involved in his parenting as possible."

I emphasise that that should happen where the safety of the child is not an issue. We also propose that contact with the non-resident parent should be frequent and continuing and that it should be reasonable—not a 50 per cent. share of the time or anything as prescriptive as that. We believe that the system needs to be fundamentally overhauled and effectively turned on its head. There should be a presumption of shared parenting and dissenting parents should have to put forward a coherent case explaining exactly why the right of the child to maintain reasonable and substantial contact with both parents should not be respected. Safety and welfare considerations should be duly weighed up by the court. I repeat that, in all that, the welfare of the child is paramount. Surely the welfare of the child is complemented, not contradicted, by maximising contact and interaction with each parent.

Margaret Moran: The implication of the hon. Gentleman's argument seems to be that, at present, the majority of cases do not involve a presumption of contact. Is he aware of the report of Her Majesty's inspectorate of court administration, which states that the presumption of contact with both parents is so overwhelming that children are being put at risk because of it? In that light, his argument does not seem sustainable.

Tim Loughton: I do not agree with the findings of that report, which was based on a rather small sample. The findings did not seem to match up with the material that was being used. The allegation that the hon. Lady has made—I have heard it before—is exceedingly unrepresentative and unhelpful.

We are not suggesting a prescriptive arrangement, or an artificial 50:50 time split that is monitored by a stop watch, as I have said. We have made submissions to the Government on how better contact could be achieved in relation to the study that is being carried out by the Minister's colleague, Baroness Ashton. Our proposals are not unique. For example, best practice jurisdictions across the United States are light years ahead of the UK and are yielding some interesting and positive results. Such legislation is common in many US states. In Canada, the new Conservative Government pledged in their election manifesto to amend the Divorce Act

"to ensure that in the event of a marital breakdown, the Divorce Act will allow both parents and all grandparents to maintain a meaningful relationship with their children and grandchildren, unless it is clearly demonstrated not to be in the best interests of the children."

Australia is amending its Family Law Act in more than 300 places to introduce the concept of parental equality. Australian judges will have to consider equal time sharing and give written reasons for any departure from equality. A mediation service is being proposed to take account of children's views. Most recently, Italy has followed suit. However, the UK Government apparently have some difficulty getting their head around the concept.

[Tim Loughton]

The fundamental principles behind our amendments met with widespread support in the other House and, at one stage, even secured the support of the Liberal Democrats. Liberal Democrats voted in support of the principles during the passage of the Children Act 2004 through the Commons, but reneged when it came to the crunch.

Annette Brooke: Does the hon. Gentleman concede that that very unpleasant debate was held before the publication of the significant Constitutional Affairs Committee report and the responses to the Green Paper, and also that the Liberal Democrats on that occasion said quite clearly that there was much of the wording with which they agreed and much with which they did not agree, but that neither did they agree with the Government's position? I think that that is quite clear. Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House why his party has changed its mind on abolishing the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service?

Tim Loughton: With the greatest respect to the hon. Lady, I think that she is wrong. She is factually wrong on the first count because the Constitutional Affairs Committee report on the Bill was published in the last Parliament and the vote that her colleagues declined to join us on at the last minute happened during this Parliament in July, when all the information was out there. Her colleagues spoke in favour of this principle and strongly indicated that they would back amendments on it. She and I went merrily through the Lobby together during the Report stage of the Bill that became the Children Act 2004 in support of the principle that we are putting forward again today. I was surprised and delighted that she joined me on that occasion, although I suppose that I should not have been surprised that when it came to the crunch, her colleagues in another place did not have the courage of their convictions. However, we shall see what the Liberal Democrats do in the later stages of this Bill.

Mr. Kidney: I will help the hon. Gentleman to move on from that little spat. I am attracted to much of what he has just said and interested in pursuing the point about cases that will go to court because of the intractable attitude of one parent. It will take some time to get a decision from the court. What is his view of the practicality of starting court proceedings on contact?

Tim Loughton: If I may, I will come on to contact—where it all starts—and mediation later in my speech.

Vera Baird rose—

Tim Loughton: I want to make some progress, but will come back to the hon. and learned Lady, too.

Our proposals have widespread support among a multitude of family and parenting groups, but I fully acknowledge that many professionals in the judiciary and some voluntary organisations do not share our view. We have engaged them in constructive debate and perfectly respect the position that they have argued reasonably, even if we do not agree with their conclusions.

It pains me to have to single out one organisation that has behaved reprehensibly on this issue. I would be the first to acknowledge that the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children has done a lot of good work in raising awareness of child abuse and campaigning against it, promoting good practice by engaging children, and raising substantial funds for services for vulnerable children. Many members of my party in my constituency enthusiastically raise money for the NSPCC, as I have in the past. However, during the proceedings on the Bill in the Lords, the NSPCC put out a briefing note that attacked our amendments as a threat to the safety of children, yet produced no evidence to support its claim.

In its latest briefing note, for our scrutiny of the Bill, the NSPCC has made the following claim:

"NSPCC believes that any proposals to introduce into the Bill a legislative presumption of contact will be interpreted and put into practice by the courts in a way which is detrimental to the welfare of the child and could ultimately threaten the safety of the child."

In effect, it is saying that if a non-resident parent—predominantly a father—benefits from a presumption of contact, he is more likely to do harm to his own child.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tim Loughton: Let me finish and I certainly will.

In support of its claim, the NSPCC cites the fact that 29 children were killed over the past 10 years during contact visits to non-resident parents. That is an appalling figure. However, it ignores its own research, which shows that over the same period some 800 children have died at the hands of resident parents or carers, and the 2000 publication "Child Maltreatment in the UK", which showed that violent treatment was more likely to be meted out by female carers than male ones.

The briefing is alarmist, sensationalist, misleading, empirically flawed, completely irresponsible and highly reprehensible. It is not worthy of an organisation such as the NSPCC, which claims to stand up for our children. I hope that our deliberations on the amendments will be based on balanced, rational and well-informed debate, rather than the arrant nonsense that I am sure will shock many dedicated and hard-working NSPCC supporters around the country.

Maria Eagle: I have no torch to bear for various elements of the lobby, including the NSPCC, but my interpretation of its comments is that paramountcy is incredibly important and might be comprised by the kind of presumption that the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Tim Loughton: The NSPCC has said quite clearly—it has not minced its words—that if our amendments about a presumption of contact, in which many other people believe, were accepted, the safety of children would be compromised at the hands of their non-resident parents, but has not offered any evidence for that. That is not a helpful addition to the constructive debate that we are trying to have in the interests of children.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): The NSPCC will have to find another forum to explain why it said what it did, but the Minister has the chance to explain why she cannot trust the courts. A non-resident parent should not be denied contact unless the case has been put to a court. If a court decides that contact should be denied, that is fair enough, but if that does not happen, the situation proposed in our amendments is right and should be supported by the Government.

Tim Loughton: My hon. Friend is right. We should not automatically consider a non-resident parent in some way to be inferior to that same parent when he or she was part of a married couple or a couple together, or inferior to the parent with whom custody resides. It is being strongly suggested by the briefing that the NSPCC has insisted on putting out again, and in stronger terms, that in some way non-resident parents are a threat to the safety of their own children. That is disgraceful and insulting to many thousands of parents who are not able to live with their children.

Vera Baird: I will not tangle with the hon. Gentleman about what the NSPCC says. I can see that he has become riled by it. Underlying the courts' position—I hope that he accepts that historically this has always been the case—there has always been a presumption that there will be joint contact, continuing contact, where that is at all possible. That is not something that CAFCASS or the Courts Service conjured up for the report. That has always been the principle for many years. Child charities worry that if the paramountcy principle is ousted so that the safety of the child stops being the first criterion and we introduce parental rights, too much emphasis is given to the need to guarantee what the hon. Gentleman calls the child's right to see the parent. There must, of course, be a two-way right. Too much precedence is given to that right and not enough is given to safety. Where domestic violence is raised, that consideration is undervalued.

Tim Loughton: The hon. and learned Lady is misinterpreting what I have said. I have not talked about parental rights. I have been clear in saying where I am coming from on this issue. We are constantly told that there is a presumption of equal contact that pervades in the courts, but that does not appear to be working. Why, therefore, is the NSPCC not complaining about the status quo? What harm will we do by putting explicitly in the Bill—something from which everybody starts—that there is that presumption? It will then be possible for everyone to argue why that should not be so in individual cases.

Beverley Hughes: It is for the NSPCC to explain its interpretation of what it has put out in its briefing. The position that we are taking does not imply a qualitative different judgment about the safety or otherwise of the non-resident parent. We must trust the courts to make individual decisions. It is important to understand—I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman does—that a statutory presumption in law is something that the courts must follow in all but exceptional circumstances. Therefore, a statutory presumption starts to fetter the discretion of the courts and makes a fundamentally different model that would compromise in law the principle of paramountcy.

Tim Loughton: The right hon. Lady needs to speak to her colleague in the upper House, Baroness Scotland, because, on 16 November, the day after consideration of Report in that House, she said in response to one of my noble Friends that a presumption "is only a presumption." That answers the Ministers question. That does not fetter the courts. The issue is up for interpretation and a presumption is only a presumption.

The system that we are talking about is best served if we can avoid reaching a certain stage by means of prevention. The best solution to acrimonious legal disputes is to prevent them coming to court in the first place. We favour concentrating more on preventive action, which keeps families together. We need to see much more work undertaken by properly resourced professionally trained social workers, who spend more time not fire fighting if something goes wrong, but more time on preventive action to keep families together in the first place rather than pulling them apart. For example, Kent has done some excellent work in that regard. That is one reason why the number of children in care in Kent has fallen dramatically.

We need also to achieve an agreed settlement earlier. As my noble Friend Earl Howe said in the other Chamber, there is a simple truth associated with contact disputes: if both parties to the dispute are content with the amount of contact that they have with the child, there is no longer any dispute. We must also agree to some form of mediation. We will have further debates about the extent to which that mediation should be imposed on, or agreed with, the parties.

The Government initiated the promising form of mediation in what was called the early interventions project in the autumn of 2003. It was a successful and imaginative project. The prototype was due to be up and running by 2004, with a national roll-out by 2005. The aim was to defuse parental battles and dramatically to reduce the number of court cases. The project was mysteriously abandoned and replaced with the ill-thought-through family resolutions pilot project, which has been mentioned, having been scuppered by the Department for Education and Skills. Perhaps the Minister can give us more detail on that, though that happened under her predecessor.

The family resolutions project, which ran for one year from September 2004 to 2005, with three pilots in London, Birmingham and Brighton, cost more than £300,000. Thousands of couples were expected to come through the process but only 47 couples started the process and only 23 of them finished it. We have already heard about that independent evaluation.

As The Guardian put it, that project was a waste of time. That was a great shame because it replaced something that was rather more worth while. We need to set up an expectation that mediation will be used to try to get things sorted before they come to court. We think that it should be close to mandatory for parents to embark on mediation processes before they come to court, and that if they refuse to take up the offer, that should go on their record. Hence my intervention earlier about differentiating between a partner who is perfectly happy to go along with the mediation process and the other party who decides that they will not have anything to do with it, with the result that both parties are subjected to court proceedings. Surely that must count against somebody who had refused unreasonably the mediation process and count more favourably to the person who was prepared to go along with it.

[Tim Loughton]

We want the early interventions project to be restored—it should be given a fair chance. That confidential mediation process would be privileged and could not be cited in subsequent court proceedings. However, there are question marks over the limited financial incentives for divorcing parents in opting for mediation. We are also concerned about the availability of people who are skilled in mediation within the Courts Service. There are many examples of where a more compelled mediation service has brought about dramatic results, particularly in Virginia where mediation has shown that after 12 years 30 per cent. of parents who had attended mediation were in weekly contact with their children as against only 7 per cent. who had been through litigation and had shunned mediation. This shows that mediation does work.

Ms Dari Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Tim Loughton: For the last time, I will give way. I will then finish. The hon. Lady can then make her own speech.

Ms Taylor: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. Does he accept or agree with the Cleveland family mediation service that if mediation is to be effective and is to be a useful tool, it should be used well before a divorce comes to court? Does he agree that it should be taken out of that arena? There is a hothouse of sensation once there are court proceedings. Mediation is much more effective before those proceedings. I would be grateful to hear the hon. Gentleman make a statement about how valuable that approach could be if it were to be supported, as it were, in the Bill.

Tim Loughton: I completely agree. I do not need to say any more. I have been making the point that the hon. Lady has outlined. It is something that works. The more that we can take such proceedings out of the court procedure, the more likely the process is to succeed. I do not think that any of us would dispute that.

I have concerns about CAFCASS, to which I shall briefly return. The Minister said that she would fund CAFCASS with increased resources. Yet its budget for this year is frozen, which effectively means a £4 million shortfall. That is at a time when more work is being imposed on CAFCASS. There are still difficulties although I accept that there have been improvements in overcoming the time delays for allocating officers to cases. However, the courts are still congested and it takes far too long before cases are scheduled and come through.

We agree with the proposal to ask CAFCASS to take on greater work with risk assessments and various other things, but none of it, however well-intentioned, will work unless properly trained, well-resourced professionals at the coalface put them into operation. The same holds for properly trained social workers who undertake preventive and monitoring work in the field and enable cases to come to court. I have attended far too many family courts where good social workers had not worked on the case when it first came to court. I was in court one day when not a single social worker had worked on the case when it first came to court.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: May I echo the point that my hon. Friend is making so eloquently? A reply dated 27 February to a question that I had asked in correspondence said that as of 30 November, 16.5 per cent., or one in six, private cases dealt with under the auspices of CAFCASS were unallocated. To develop the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird), I am concerned that the extra work programmes that we are imposing on CAFCASS may put it in a difficult position.

Tim Loughton: My hon. Friend has made a very good point. If the measure is to work, the professionals must be given the tools that they need. CAFCASS is concerned about its budget, and whether it can maintain the progress that it has made since it experienced a significant transformation.

As for court transparency, a great deal of resentment is caused by proceedings in camera. Many decisions are difficult to comprehend, so there is a need for courts to open up as we look forward to the consultation paper promised by the Government. The Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs said before the election:

> "A greater degree of transparency is required in the family courts. An obvious move would be to allow the press and public into the family courts under appropriate reporting restrictions and subject to the judge's discretion."

A less radical proposal would be to make it a rule that all judgments are published in family cases unless there are exceptional circumstances. Judges already have such a power, but many choose not to exercise it. We would therefore like to see the Government's proposals on opening up the court system, as they would provide reassurance for many parents who feel hard done by. Recently, Mr. Justice Munby made a strong plea for more transparency, suggesting that the current restrictions may even breach the European convention on human rights:

> "Because of this secrecy misunderstanding about how the family justice system operates are allowed to grow and fester unchecked and uncorrected."

In Committee—assuming that the Committee of Selection selects me as a Committee member—I will go into greater detail about the frustration of contact orders but, as I said earlier, the Bill lacks teeth. Defiance of contact orders should be monitored by the court system. We should not just rely on the non-resident parent crying foul before we initiate and pay for legal challenges. Serial frustrators are able to play the system, ultimately leading them to be in contempt of court, although the relevant powers are rarely used. Prison is not a practical option, and electronic tagging, I am glad to say, has been dropped. There are problems with the payment of compensation, and I would like the Government to consider the proposal on compensatory contact time, which we support and which was mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar. Whatever measures are put in place should be on a sliding scale so that the offender has many opportunities to reform their behaviour and comply with the contact orders, subject to checks and balances if they are scared to do so because of domestic violence and other threats.

Penalties must be realistic, and there should be a perception that they can and will be imposed if the offender continues to flout the contact orders.

False accusations, usually of domestic violence, are sometimes made. I am not seeking to undermine the fact that domestic violence takes place, but parents may fabricate claims of domestic violence, and we should come down hard on such claims. We certainly need to speed up investigations of claims of domestic violence. Some interesting work is under way in Australia, where serious consideration is being given to a proposal to compel people to pay costs for vexatious complaints.

Finally, on the subject of inter-country adoption, it is perfectly legitimate to adopt overseas and, in many cases, such adopters perform a humanitarian role. I share concerns about cases of child trafficking, particularly, it was claimed, after the tsunami. There were claims of such cases in Cambodia, which is why a decision was made on that country. We should clamp down rigorously on anything that constitutes the trafficking of children. Procedures were tightened in the Adoption and Children Act 2001, and we supported those measures. I am concerned, however, about the imbalance in adoption numbers. In the past 10 years, about 3,000 children have been adopted overseas, of whom 1,441—almost half—came from China. Many of those children, I suspect, were baby girls. Should we concentrate so much on a country with a questionable social stance on baby girls? The next largest contributor was India, where 235 children were adopted; followed by Guatemala, where 205 children were adopted; then Russia, where 177 children were adopted, and Thailand, where 171 children were adopted. I am in favour of inter-country adoption where appropriate, but I question the imbalance in the countries from where children have been adopted in recent years.

Another problem arises from the fact that, unlike many other western countries, we lack an inter-country adoption agency. How much evidence of trafficking will be required to trigger the suspension of a country from inter-country adoption arrangements? Why are the rules not working if we are clamping down properly on child trafficking? We need to act in the best interests of the child, and I certainly welcome the provisions that allow for special exceptions in individual cases. We are concerned, however, about the scale of charges for work on inter-country adoption. Such a proposal was not included in the draft Bill, and inter-country adoption is already an expensive and bureaucratic business. The British Association for Adoption and Fostering has expressed concern about the Government charging for a service:

> "It is hard to see why one group of UK residents—prospective intercountry adopters—should be singled out for payment of a fee for the provision of a service such as this . . . Any suggestion that public money should only be spent on safeguarding the welfare of children indigenous to this country is surely repugnant both morally and in the light of our international obligations.
> We believe any additional financial burden on intercountry adopters may run the risk of a minority seeking to circumvent procedures, thereby putting some children at risk."

We should clamp down on inappropriate inter-country adoption but, equally, we should be wary about encouraging private fostering arrangements by the back door. As we seem to do on an annual basis, we will table an amendment on the registration of private foster carers. Such registration was not included in the Children Act 2004, although there was a fallback suggestion that it might be introduced. We will therefore revisit the issue, and dust down our amendments on private fostering registration.

The Bill is a short one, but it includes a great deal of detail. Some provisions are contentious, particularly those on contact orders. It received a great deal of scrutiny in the other place, but it remains a highly unsatisfactory Bill. Many parts are fundamentally flawed, and it is a missed opportunity. Above all, it fails to do what it could and should do, so we are letting down too many children who have been let down by an acrimonious split in a family. We had an opportunity in the Bill to give them a second chance of a meaningful relationship with both their parents, and for most children that is the best start in life that we can give them.

2.8 pm

Margaret Moran (Luton, South) (Lab): I welcome the Minister's strong support for the principle of paramountcy, particularly in the face of comments by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton). Many of us believe that his proposal would undermine that fundamental principle.

I am afraid, however, that the Bill could go further to ensure that the principle of the safety of the child is enhanced. This feels a little like groundhog day, because many hon. Members participating in our debate took part in similar discussions in the Joint Committee that considered the draft Adoption and Children Bill as well as the subsequent Bill Committee. We were concerned that existing legislation had not done enough to safeguard children at risk in contact situations, particularly if there was a risk of domestic violence.

I was pleased that the Government accepted our arguments about the risks to children in contact cases involving violence, and that my amendment was accepted, which extended the definition of harm to the child to include impairment due to seeing or hearing ill treatment of another. For the first time we enshrined in law and recognised the damage to the child caused by witnessing domestic violence and the fact that that should form part of the court's consideration. As the Minister noted, further measures have been introduced to improve family court practice with regard to domestic violence, most recently in January this year, when new court application forms were introduced.

Even so, at that time many of us said that the measure would not be sufficient to remove the risk to children, and so it has proved. None of the measures so far introduced or in the Bill require courts to ensure that contact is safe. To date there is no evidence to suggest that court practice has been improved. That is asserted not just by me, but by all the leading children's charities, including the NSPCC, Barnado's, NCH Action for Children, Women's Aid, the Greater London domestic violence project, Respect, Men's Advice Line and Enquiry Service and others—in other words, all the experts on the subject.

Despite the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham decrying the report of Her Majesty's inspectorate of court administration, we cannot ignore the evidence from its study showing that in the work of

[Margaret Moran]

CAFCASS in this regard, there is such a strong presumption of contact with both parents that concerns about safety and the risk to the child are overridden, thereby putting children in severe danger of violence and abuse.

Notwithstanding the legislation and recent Government initiatives, there is still grave concern that children's needs are minimised or ignored, and that many parents and children remain unsafe during contact arrangements as a result of contact orders being awarded inappropriately. If, as we all profess, the safety and welfare of the child should be the key principle throughout the legislation, we need to amend the Bill further in the interests of the safety of the child. It is important that all the proceedings covered by the Bill have the paramountcy principle at their heart.

I welcome the amendments made in the other place in relation to the introduction of clause 7. That is a significant step forward, but the court is still not required to act on the risk assessment by CAFCASS. I recognise the extensive work done by the Government to tackle domestic violence, but in the interests of children's safety the Bill should incorporate a requirement that the court act upon the risk assessment required under clause 7. It is clear that in the criminal justice system the dangers of separation where there has been a history of domestic violence are recognised, but the same understanding is not evident in many parts of the family justice system.

Much of the debate in the other place and to some extent in the Chamber today has been based on anecdote. We need a great deal more research on the subject of contact and the reasons why contact is not taking place in cases where an enforcement order has been issued. I hope that the Department will take that on board.

Let us deal with some facts. The victims of domestic violence face greatest risk post-separation. Research shows that children ordered by courts to have contact with a violent parent are likely to be abused and in some cases killed. The Green Paper on parental separation recognises that of the 10 per cent. of contact cases that get to court, in at least 35 per cent. of them there are concerns about the safety of the child. CAFCASS officers state that in about 66 per cent. of the caseload domestic violence is a significant factor.

Despite that, judicial statistics indicate that less than 1 per cent. of applications for contact orders are refused. It is clear that parents and children are being exposed to unsafe conditions by court orders. Research by Trinder in 2005 shows that

> "In many of these families there had been violence in the home. Quite commonly, there were child protection concerns. The disputes presented to the court did not reflect straightforward arguments about 'contact'; they reflected a range of issues, including commitment to the child, reliability, parenting quality, the child's reaction to contact, and perceived attempts to bully or control. In short these families experienced problems on a different scale from those experienced by the majority of separating parents, including multiple risk factors associated with poor outcomes for children."

In other words, the family courts are dealing with the most difficult cases where children are likely to be at risk. That is reinforced by a study of 73 private law family cases, which found that one year after contact proceedings ended, the children were still experiencing similar levels of emotional and behavioural disturbance as children who had been the subject of child protection proceedings. That was linked to distress among the parents and high levels of intimidation and domestic violence.

Rather than a blanket assumption that contact will always be beneficial, the findings emphasise the importance of assessing risk and considering what is best for each child. That is supposed to happen because the welfare of the child is paramount in the Children Act 1989, so why are children still at risk after all this time? First, there is insufficient liaison between the criminal justice system and the family justice system. Following an investigation into the murder of Georgina McCarthy, whose violent ex-husband used contact proceedings to obtain information as to her whereabouts, the Advisory Board on Family Law stated:

> "The view of the Home Office, with which we agree, is that there needs to be much greater liaison and co-operation between the criminal justice system and the family justice system over issues of domestic violence at all court levels".

When Dame Elizabeth Butler-Sloss was asked by the Select Committee why schedule 1 offenders were still being granted contact with their children, her response was that judges do not always know when they are dealing with a parent who has been convicted of an offence against a child. That cannot be satisfactory.

Clearly, the family justice system does not have good liaison with the criminal justice system, yet we hear that the judiciary would like greater powers to enforce contact orders, even though they might unknowingly be granting contact in high risk cases. How can we legislate to give judges more powers to enforce contact, when the Bill does not contain a clause requiring pre-court checks in all cases? Such checks are needed because domestic violence tends to remain hidden. I understand that two cases in which children were killed during contact visits involved consent orders. The parents' solicitors agreed contact arrangements which were then rubber-stamped by the court, with no consideration of the possible risk.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: Does the hon. Lady agree that some children's charities have already criticised the Bill because the paramountcy principle is not explicitly at its centre, and less so than the 1989 Act?

Margaret Moran: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. The representations that I have received state that the Bill includes the paramountcy principle. There are concerns that the paramountcy principle is being undermined by existing case law and practice within the family courts, and we therefore need to reinforce clause 7 to ensure not only that risk assessments are conducted, but that the courts are required to act upon such risk assessments when they make decisions in difficult cases.

Most children's charities argue for a further strengthening of the Bill, because they know that the paramountcy principle has already been undermined by case law precedents. For example, in re O in 1995, which concerned the imposition of conditions for contact, it was stated that contact is "almost always in the interest of the child".

It was hoped that court practice on child contact and domestic violence would improve after the judgment in re L, V, M & H in 2000, which stated that the courts should have a heightened awareness of the effects of domestic violence on children and that they should make findings of fact and minimise risk. That judgment also upheld the ruling that contact is almost always in the best interests of the child.

Both case law and the inspectorate of court administration report on the practice of CAFCASS indicate that there is a strong presumption of contact despite the existence of the paramountcy principle, which is supposed to be the court's priority. The inspectorate of court administration report on CAFCASS's activities in such cases states that "No formal risk assessment was undertaken in any of the observed interviews".

The report also notes

"a worrying lack of attention to safety planning" and that

"the nature of domestic abuse is not sufficiently understood by most CAFCASS practitioners".

The inspectorate of court administration report identifies the strong presumption of contact as the fundamental reason for the failure to protect children. CAFCASS officers admit that it is difficult for them to challenge the strong presumption of contact, even when there are concerns about the continuing impact of abuse on a child. Although the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham does not regard the report as significant, many hon. Members do, and it should make us think carefully about what the Bill does to facilitate and enforce contact.

Are the safeguards adequate to ensure that contact is safe before contact orders are enforced? I shall pray in aid the Prime Minister's reply to my recent parliamentary question:

"We of course are concerned by the finding of the Inspectorate of Court Administration report that there is such a strong presumption by the courts that there must be contact with both parents that concerns about violence and children's safety are overridden. We remain utterly committed to the principle that the welfare of the child should be paramount in the consideration of the courts. We recognise that more needs to be done to address domestic violence concerns".—[Official Report, 2 November 2005; Vol. 438, c. 828.]

As I have said, the amendment by the other place is extremely welcome, but it does not require the court to take that advice into consideration, and the Bill should state that that is a requirement. Furthermore, we must examine pre-contact risk assessment, which must be considered throughout all proceedings, including enforcement proceedings. When enforcement takes place, we must ensure that there is a requirement for a further risk assessment should it be necessary to safeguard the care and welfare of the child. We know that the most dangerous points for children and their parents in domestic violence cases are the points of separation and of contact. In the interests of children, it is therefore vital that we not only say that a risk assessment may be taken into account, but require it to be done before enforcement, because the danger is that domestic violence has taken place after the parents first had contact with the courts. We owe children nothing less than that.

The Bill requires a further provision on the voice of children. The Adoption and Children Act 2002 includes a requirement that children's views should be taken into account, but as I understand it, that provision has not been enforced. We should include a provision in this Bill to enforce section 122 of the 2002 Act, which introduced separate representation for children in family proceedings.

Tim Loughton: I have some sympathy with the idea of taking children's views into account and have cited the example of Australia, where representations by children are being beefed up. However, putting a young, vulnerable child in a court scenario will create problems in practice, and it may be better to conduct such matters from the home of the parent who has custody. Does the hon. Lady have practical solutions on how best to take into account the views of a child without intimidating them, which may prevent them from providing a balanced view?

Margaret Moran: Those concerns were extensively debated in the proceedings on the 2002 Act. Children's charities have introduced many proposals on how we can ensure that children's voices are safeguarded, that undue pressure is not applied and that the child's voice, rather than that of their parents, is considered. I think that we need to seek the advice of children's charities.

Vera Baird: Does my hon. Friend agree that working out how children's voices can be heard in court is an urgent issue? These days, it is easy for child abuse to take place in a criminal context, but it is impossible to bring action because of the tender years of the child, which means that people of tender years are not protected. It is critical that we turn our minds to the whole issue of bringing children's evidence into court.

Margaret Moran: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. I hope that we will have a detailed discussion on that topic, if we are lucky enough to be selected as members of the Committee.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: I am making a habit of agreeing with the sensible comments made by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). Given that the 2002 Act has been on the statute book for more than three years and that there is ample academic evidence that the voice of children acts as a catalyst to obviating the need for a bitter and long-standing dispute between parents, does the hon. Member for Luton, South (Margaret Moran) agree that the Government are remiss in not having acted on section 122 of the 2002 Act? Indeed, perhaps she knows why the Government have not acted.

Margaret Moran: I am not furnishing all the answers today. I hope that we will all seek greater truth in Committee, should we be lucky enough to be selected.

Vera Baird: My hon. Friend is being used as something of a ping-pong ball by me and the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson), who is of course missing the point. This is nothing to do with introducing the ability to have a child's voice heard in a technical sense—the problem is how to involve the views and experience of the child so that that becomes credible evidence.

Margaret Moran: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for her usual clarity.

Opposition Members and those in the other place have been extremely exercised by the enforcement of contact orders. I would hate for anyone to misunderstand me on this. I agree that in the best of all possible worlds, it is always best for children to have contact with both parents, but we are dealing not with the best of all possible worlds but with cases where the evidence suggests that there are severe risks to the child. We must therefore build into the legislation every precaution to ensure that contact is safe for those children. We are not dealing with the generality of contact orders. Equally, I agree that vexatious parents who deny contact for their own reasons should have the proverbial book thrown at them. Again, however, we must be absolutely certain that those children are safe before contact is enforced. As things stand, the Bill has no such requirement. That is urgently needed.

We need pre-court checks at the beginning of all proceedings to assess whether there may be safety concerns and a more comprehensive definition of risk assessment in legislation or in regulations. Courts must have regard to any risk assessment and order contact only if it is safe to do so. I fully support perpetrator programmes, provided that they are legitimate programmes run by organisations such as Respect and MALE, which have a long history of understanding perpetrator practice, not short courses that purport to resolve domestic violence and treat perpetrators in one day. We have to be careful about what is meant by proper perpetrator programmes, and we must ensure that the voice of the child is heard.

We do not want to experience further groundhog days as parliamentarians, but this is not only an issue for us but one that has serious implications for the lives of our children. Twenty-nine children have been killed as a result of contact arrangements in England and Wales. Serious case reviews indicate that with regard to five of 13 families involved, contact was ordered by the court, but no court professionals have been held to account for those homicides. Children have paid with their lives for the presumption that exists, and will continue to exist unless we amend the Bill, that contact is almost always in the best interests of the child—the presumption that the family justice system abides by and holds so dear. It is time that that is balanced by a legal requirement that the court must have due regard to risk assessments and be satisfied that that contact will be safe for our children. Nothing less will do.

2.33 pm

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I congratulate Members who have spoken so far on the tone of the debate. We have already had a useful sharing of views and new ideas. That is all-important—after all, we are all trying to ensure that the best interests of the child are served.

Our debate must focus on the best outcomes for the child. For me, it is important that the principles in the United Nations convention on the rights of the child are upheld. Many articles are relevant to the Bill. Article 3 states that "the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration."

As we have heard, article 12 covers the right of the child to express views freely—

"the views of the child being given due weight in accordance with age and maturity."

The next paragraph is especially relevant. It states that "the child shall in particular be provided with the opportunity to be heard in any judicial and administrative proceedings affecting the child."

The right to be heard and how it is facilitated are critical.

Article 9 states that it should be ensured that "a child shall not be separated from his or her parents against their will except"

under some of the conditions that we have discussed. When there is a possibility of separation from one or both parents, the article states that relations and direct contact should be maintained with both parents regularly, except if that is contrary to the child's best interest. Articles 11 and 21 are especially relevant to the adoption provisions of the Bill.

I welcome some aspects of the Bill. I do not feel quite as negative as the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) about it. Its origins go back several years and there has been a great deal of consultation. The issues that part 1 covers constitute an acknowledgement of the great dissatisfaction with the way in which the legal process has handled contact disputes.

As the Minister for Children and Families said, a multi-faceted approach is important. It is also important to try to increase the proportion of parents who resolve contact issues without recourse to the courts, and the proportion of those who have reached the court process but are supported to find agreed solutions. We must also improve the efficiency and effectiveness with which the remaining intractable cases are tackled. We must appreciate that those cases—approximately 10 per cent. of the total— are complex.

To go back a stage further, it is important to recognise the importance of the family unit, with no prescriptive view of the shape that a family may take. The family structure may change for a child, but the important aspect is loving, caring and safe relationships in the family. The preamble of the United Nations convention on the rights of the child stresses

"recognising that the child, for the full and harmonious development of his or her personality should grow up in a family environment, in an atmosphere of happiness, love and understanding."

I suppose that we could say, "We wish."

The Constitutional Affairs Committee report that covered matters of importance to the Bill was entitled "Family Justice". Sometimes, experiences in my constituency surgeries make me ask, "Justice for whom?" Do we mean justice for parents or for the children? Somehow, one loses sight of the fact that there was a family unit. We need to proceed in such a way as to retain the importance of the family, even if all its members are not located in the same residence.

Support for the family generally is important. I declare an interest—I wish it were greater than it is—as a trustee of Poole community family trust. I do not believe that it will receive any Government funding in the near future. The principle behind community family trusts of working on relationship education prior to partnerships becoming permanent—for example, by working through checklists and especially through providing relationship education in schools—is excellent.

Such preventive measures are part of what should be a lifetime of family support that can be accessed at appropriate times. When we consider the amount of support that is needed when a breakdown occurs, we realise that such early investment is crucial. Clearly, even in the case of an irrevocable breakdown, if the parents have an amicable split contact arrangements are much easier to tackle.

Part 1 is the result of a process that began way back in March 2001. Following consultation, a report entitled "Making Contact Work" was published in 2002 by the Children Act Sub-Committee—CASC—of the Lord Chancellor's advisory board on family law. Its recommendations covered several issues that we are debating today. However, it was not until July 2004 that the Government published their Green Paper on parental separation, which acknowledged that the way in which the courts intervene in disputed contact cases does not work well. The results of the consultation were published in "Next Steps" in January 2005. We then had pre-legislative scrutiny. That is an excellent process, on which the Government are to be commended. There should be much more of it. The Bill was then introduced in the other place, and we are now debating it today, five years after the process started. It is hardly surprising that people have become impatient.

There has been high drama throughout the period, involving not only the antics of various fathers' groups, but the significant report of the then Select Committee on the Lord Chancellor's Department on the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service—CAFCASS—which resulted in the whole of the CAFCASS board resigning. Positive changes have emanated from that and we are now beginning to feel confidence in its ability to change the way in which it works, but it certainly faces enormous challenges. CAFCASS has just completed its consultation paper "Every Day Matters", and I shall say more about CAFCASS later. I want to note the significance of that title. It illustrates the importance of dealing with these disputes in an effective but cautious way. However, we have just been through a five-year process. Surely that is too long.

We have already heard evidence of important case studies and seen data from the Office for National Statistics, but do we really know the extent of contact denial or breakdown? The evidence that I have seen suggests that we tend to get different answers, depending on whether we ask the resident parent or the non-resident parent. Obviously, perceptions will differ, but that makes it all the more important to set up the research projects with great care. It is welcome that the Government are setting up a further research project on what happens between a case arriving in court and a final contact order being made. However, that research could well take 18 months, and we shall have completed our work on the Bill long before that. Research has also been undertaken on the gateway forms, although I have not come across its findings. Perhaps the Minister will talk about that later. Time is ticking by—we should have commissioned some of this research rather earlier.

We wholeheartedly support the presumption that the welfare of the child must be paramount, as set out in the Children Act 1989. Given that presumption, I should like to address four issues: safety, mediation, contact and enforcement. If I have time, I shall also mention resources and transparency. I concur with what has already been said about the paramountcy principle being included in all proceedings referred to in the Bill. In particular, it should be added to clauses 4 and 5. I agree with the points made by the hon. Member for Luton, South (Margaret Moran) on that matter.

The Government have made an important contribution to tackling domestic violence, but can we ever do enough in that regard? In relation to contact and the safety of children, there is frequently a history of violence behind the cases that come to court. A statistic that is often cited is that in 2003, 16,000 cases involving domestic violence came before the family courts, but contact orders were refused in only 601 of them. It is difficult to say whether domestic violence is under-recorded. Many groups feel strongly that it is, and I certainly have a distinct feeling that that is the case. However, others will argue that it is over-recorded.

I am pleased also to be able to congratulate the Government on the fact that the availability of supervised contact centres is improving. However, the provision of such centres is still inadequate and many more are needed. We heard earlier about the inadequacy of provision in Northamptonshire. In Dorset, even if we achieve two contact centres, people will still have great difficulty because there is so little public transport.

I am pleased that the Government responded favourably to the Select Committee's suggestion that more innovative solutions should be considered. The Minister mentioned the use of children's centres and extended schools, for instance. I have no idea whether the resources that the Government are allocating will be adequate, but I sincerely hope that they will.

We have long felt strongly that any contact activity should be subject to careful and separate risk assessment to minimise possible risk, especially to children but also to others involved, particularly women. The Joint Committee responsible for the scrutiny recommended that before making contact or enforcement orders, courts should be explicitly required to consider the safety implications for both child and parent. I am glad that the other place agreed to introduce risk assessments. I look forward to scrutinising the new clause in Committee because it concerns a vital issue. I hope that it can be strengthened.

Why are reports of domestic violence increasing? Are we becoming a more violent society? Have the gateway forms encouraged people to come forward and say something, or are people using domestic violence as part of the unfortunate game, as has been suggested? It is encouraging in many ways that people are speaking out more and acknowledging the issue of domestic violence, but when there is a dispute between two parents on whether domestic violence has occurred, a mandatory risk assessment will be helpful. Both sides will have an opportunity to present their points, and the playing field will become more level.

[Annette Brooke]

The safety issue needs to be revisited over time. That will be difficult because the situation will not remain static. We hope that some of the perpetrator programmes will be successful. There will be additional strains as time goes on, and domestic violence may occur when it has not occurred in the past. Safety issues should also be considered before the mediation route is taken, although mediation must be a priority.

The Government have made a good start. We may have criticisms over which project has been adopted and which has not, but there is much more emphasis on mediation and an understanding that it must be better than warfare and conflict, in which the child becomes a pawn. Mediation should be used as an opportunity to strengthen relationships and to ensure that the outcome is the best for the child and does not merely serve the parents' interests. It might be good for the parent to see the child, but if it involves hundreds of miles of travel for the child, that must be borne in mind. Putting the child first is all-important.

Mr. Kidney: I strongly support mediation, but who pays for it now and who does the hon. Lady think should pay for it in future?

Annette Brooke: I understand that if both parents are on legal aid, mediation will be free, but I am not sure what happens when, for example, one parent is on legal aid and the other is not. I hope that the Minister will address the issue. Certainly we should consider it in Committee.

The 10 per cent. of cases that reach the courts are those in which people need the most support and problem-solving. It may seem a small percentage, but in terms of numbers it represents a large tragedy. Each year there are 40,000 applications to the courts over child contact, and 70,000 breaches of child contact orders. That should concern us greatly.

The consultation document issued by CAFCASS, "Every Day Matters", makes some good points about intervention. CAFCASS frequently intervenes too late, long after parents' attitudes to each other have hardened, or long after one parent has created a new household excluding his or her former partner. Indeed, many attitudes have hardened long before the first court application—hence the need for even earlier intervention where possible. Arguments about the fine detail of contact arrangements occupy huge amounts of scarce professional time, often unproductively. Once a court application is made, there is a clear risk of an adversarial model of law being started. The consultation document illustrates why we must put such emphasis on early intervention. However, we must also make information easily accessible. The Minister mentioned the telephone helpline. I understand that booklets are available, but I wonder whether they are necessarily the best format for those who need to access information. I would like to know exactly what is available for parents at the moment and whether, for example, videos as well as printed leaflets are available.

Research by the university of East Anglia and other research indicate that many of the parents among the 10 per cent. that go to court are very young, poorly educated and on low incomes with extremely young children. Partly because of their lack of education, they often find it difficult to communicate not only with each other, but with those who try to help them. There may be a deep lack of trust between the parents, a history of violence, or poor parenting skills. Parenting skills play an important part in preventing such situations from becoming adversarial, which is when worries arise about the vulnerability of the children.

We agree with the Government—I have done quite a bit of that so far—that mediation cannot be made compulsory. One can put two people in a room with someone but, if they are not prepared to participate, one cannot make it work. However, we support the case for a compulsory referral meeting about mediation. We think that that is where the compulsion should take place. We argue that that meeting should be free, as we do not think that we can compel people to do something and then charge for it. I qualify that by saying that any meeting would need to take account of the principle that the welfare of the child is paramount.

Vera Baird: As the hon. Lady says, it is wrong to compel people to take part in mediation, but is it not also wrong to try to arrange that? There are reservations about mediation where there may be domestic violence issues. Clearly, if someone is to be forced to try to resolve things through a face to face with the person who has been oppressing them for many years, that is an inappropriate model.

Annette Brooke: I thank the hon. and learned Lady. I have mentioned twice in that context that safety must be the prime consideration. It is important that, before we consider mediation, we examine the risk assessments. I said that earlier. I am conscious how dangerous—emotionally dangerous, too—it could be to put two such people in a room.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: I am following the hon. Lady's speech closely. Is she aware of the experience in both the United States and Norway, where empirical evidence shows that compulsion largely has worked, and that when people are compelled to take part in mediation it makes a real difference in trying to save the situation from deteriorating further after divorce or separation?

Annette Brooke: I have heard mention of projects in other countries, but have not come across the full, long-term evaluation of them. I feel that, logically—perhaps my background as a school teacher showed me this—we cannot make people, or children, do something that they do not want to do.

On the family resolutions pilot project, I know that there was general disappointment about the number of cases that were referred to it. However, it was a starting point. I regret that we cannot discuss the evaluation of that project, as we were not aware that it was put on the website today. I look forward to the Minister telling us a bit about it later.

Returning to mediation, it would help if the court application triggered compulsory attendance at the preliminary meeting. At that introductory session—the couple in question might choose to meet the mediator separately—the options for mediation could be outlined, including offers of other parenting help. That information could be given to the parents face to face, which, I suspect, would be the most efficient way of dealing with some of these difficult cases. The first meeting must be free; otherwise, cost could prove a barrier. Of course, there is the question of what happens if one partner is on legal aid and the other is not. If both are not on legal aid, that could present difficulties.

I take on board entirely the point about risk assessment before mediation and the desire to intervene as early as possible. Here, we need to strike a balance. Perhaps that first meeting could be held even before going to court. I realise that that would present difficulties, but the sooner the conciliation process begins, the better. The whole package—mediation, counselling, parenting classes, contact activities—is important, but we need to consider the money and skills needed to resource such activities. That is particularly true of the domestic violence programmes.

It is difficult to know how big the problem is. Contact is a high-profile issue and we all know of people who feel aggrieved. Indeed, we probably all have friends who have told us how big a problem this is. Such people appear to have genuine grievances and we cannot just brush them aside and say, "We are doing all these other things—it's going to be all right." We need to address the question of contact and bear in mind the United Nations convention on the rights of the child. A child has the right to direct and regular contact with both parents, unless it is contrary to the child's best interest. It is generally acknowledged to be in the child's best interest to sustain a full relationship with both parents but, obviously, in some cases it is not—for instance, if there is a risk of harm. Indeed, relationships involving conflict can be immensely mentally damaging for the child caught in the middle.

We should not be too prescriptive—I would hate to go down the 50:50 route and argue that that is a fair starting point—but we should go a bit further than we currently do. As we have heard, various documents acknowledge the presumption of joint contact.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I should be interested to hear the hon. Lady's views on the fact that 40 per cent. of parents lose contact with their children within two years of separation or divorce. We need to focus on that issue, because that is the reality.

Annette Brooke: I thank the hon. Lady for that intervention, but I shall deal with that point in due course as I want to make some progress.

We have talked at great length here and in the other place about whether it is possible to have two presumptions, and what I hear about the possible undermining of the safety of the child worries me. It is a question of listening. In its written evidence to the Select Committee, Resolution—formerly the Solicitors Family Law Association—suggested that there should be a first presumption and then a second: the first relating to the child, and a second, lower-order presumption relating to the right to see both parents. That was the position during one of our debates, but when Resolution gave oral evidence to the Select Committee, it appeared to change its mind, supporting instead the insertion of a statement into the welfare checklist in the Children Act 1989. It is significant that a major association should, on having listened to what others had said, change its mind in the process of giving evidence.

Vera Baird: I understand the hon. Lady's concern, but Resolution is talking about putting a common-sense presumption in the welfare checklist, whereas the Tory Opposition advocate a legal presumption. However, an absolute legal presumption cannot be changed. If it is rebuttable, it can be rebutted, but it still has to be overturned, and that is a very different matter.

Annette Brooke: That is my point. The Select Committee concluded that inserting a statement into the welfare checklist offered a possible solution and did not have the dangers associated with having two legal presumptions. It also said that the court should have regard—and this is the critical point—to the importance of sustaining a relationship between children and non-resident parents.

That approach was also endorsed by the Scrutiny Committee. I know that the Government heard that request, and I hope that the Minister will say whether there will be any response to it. We have been told again today, as we have been told repeatedly, that the assumption of reasonable contact is established in case law, but we should try to find appropriate wording—perhaps in the form of something added to the welfare checklist—to give some clarity and guidance.

With reference to the point raised by the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller), what amounts almost to a self-generating bias has been caused by the delays that occurred in the past. It is clear that a resolution is even harder to achieve if a non-resident parent has not had contact with a child for six months or longer. In such cases, the outcome is almost a self-fulfilling prophecy. What can we do? Is it a question only of making the court process more efficient, or can we put in place some mechanism to deal with the problem, where there is no risk of harm? I hope to be able to explore that in greater detail in Committee.

The hon. Member for Luton, South said that it is vital that the views of children are fully considered. My impression is that, in good circumstances, CAFCASS does take account of children's views and deals with them very well. It would be interesting to have some evidence in that regard, but hearsay suggests that that body's response is patchy across the country. I support the NSPCC's contention that the Bill fails to make any provision in respect of the mechanism by which the courts may ascertain the child's wishes and feelings, or ensure that separate representation for the child is available when that child might be at risk and his or her interests are in conflict with those of the parents.

Section 122 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 has been mentioned already. I have tabled some parliamentary questions on the matter, but it would be very helpful if the Minister who winds up the debate is able to say whether the provision is likely to be implemented in the near future. A great deal of research exists to suggest that taking a child's wishes and feelings into account can lead to better resolution between parents. We must find the best practice in that respect, but I am sure that all hon. Members want that outcome.

[Annette Brooke]

Much has been said in the debate about enforcement, although I have not devoted as much of my speech to the topic as the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham did. It is important to consider different penalties, and my earlier intervention was aimed simply at establishing whether a range of penalties existed. The community punishment is obviously preferable to sending a parent to prison, which is a last resort, but the way that it is operated by the probation service means that some parents will find it difficult to make sure that the child's interests are not affected. For example, a parent who is sent on a gardening scheme might have to wear a very visible jacket, and her child might think, "That's my mother doing that."

I am not convinced that the community punishment work would be appropriate in all cases. Will the Minister say whether the provisions in the earlier part of the Bill could be applied as part of a contact order's enforcement process so that, for instance, a person could be sent off to an appropriate parenting course? That would add to the range of available penalties, although all matters to do with contact activities, community service and so on obviously require adequate resourcing. We know that delays have been caused by CAFCASS, but in "Every Day Matters" it seems almost to be putting on a brave face. It says that it does not have enough resources, but that it has proposed new solutions. We have to be concerned that CAFCASS is adequately resourced.

I asked a parliamentary question recently and established that while the average training budget per employee was as high as £644 in one year, this year it had slipped down to £390. If we envisage CAFCASS carrying out a much wider range of activities, including risk assessments, training will be all-important. We have to get it right. There is a great deal of concern about the potential under-resourcing of CAFCASS when it is taking on a changing role.

Finally, on part 1, I concur with the Conservative Opposition that increasing transparency where it is safe and appropriate to do so in the family court system will help to address some of the current grievances.

I shall be rather brief on part 2, not because it is not important, but simply because with the interventions that I have taken I have been speaking for rather a long time. It is absolutely right that we have slightly more focus on adults in this part of the Bill, although safeguarding children is still important. We all know that inter-country adoption happens for different reasons. Frequently, people adopt children from within their extended family or friendship ties. More often than not, such adoptions are nothing like that. There are thousands of children waiting for adoption in this country, but they are older children and they have a number of problems. People choose to go abroad to adopt babies. The proposed legislation will cover countries, I presume, such as the USA. It is not simply about people who, for humanitarian reasons, go abroad to adopt children in need.

The procedures for suspending adoptions from other countries need to be clear, transparent and fair. I supported the decision to take urgent action on Cambodia when trafficking issues arose. The process of inter-country adoption is extremely long. It is an extensive and expensive process. I have some concerns about the fee issue, which was discussed at length in the other place. I agree with the extension of the time limit from six to 12 months, as proposed in clause 14. It will stop people evading some of the rigours of the adoption procedures in other countries. There is quite a dilemma in terms of time taken and expense, but it is important to get it right. I look forward to debating that fully in Committee.

Baroness Barker moved an amendment in another place to make it easier in appropriate cases for children to be adopted from the UK to overseas, more often than not by relatives. As promised by the Minister in that debate, a meeting has taken place with civil servants. Does the Minister have any update for us on that today? I understand the difficulties of establishing sufficient safeguards for children, but clearly it is important to look at the issue that way on as well.

Baroness Barker said in the other place:

"Until such time as we have a private fostering system that is properly regulated in this country, we will continue to run up against problems that sometimes are masked as inter-country adoptions but more likely are about trafficking."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 29 June 2005; Vol. 673, c. 282.]

Recently, we have seen reports about the number of children in this country who simply disappear as a result of a badly regulated system of private fostering. I, too, have made my cause the need to make progress to proper regulation of private fostering. That is important.

All in all, there are some important and useful aspects to the Bill and I look forward to a constructive time in Committee, where everyone will listen to one another and we will come up with a safe solution, while acknowledging that there are issues about how the current system operates.

Ann Coffey (Stockport) (Lab): I was a member of the Joint Committee that performed the pre-legislative scrutiny of the draft Bill in February 2005, together with my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) and my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Jonathan Shaw). I am also a member of the Modernisation Committee, which is conducting an examination of how scrutiny of legislation can be improved. A Committee that gives pre-legislative scrutiny to Bills makes a valuable contribution to ensuring that we get the best possible legislation to achieve the outcomes that we want. It enables interested parties, including lobby groups, to give evidence, both oral and written, to the Committee and allows members to look at the legislation, taking into account those comments. It also enables those comments to be more closely scrutinised and challenged by the Committee members.

The Committee takes its task very seriously because members know that the Government will listen carefully to their recommendations. Indeed, the Government accepted 11 of those recommendations, which shows the benefits of the process in improving legislation. I was particularly pleased that the Government withdrew both curfews and electronic tagging as enforcement orders.

The major clauses in the Bill deal with the very difficult area of how the courts can intervene when separating parents cannot agree on the kind of contact each parent should have with the child of that relationship. The interest of the child must be paramount in a system that still remains mainly focused on the resolution of disputes between adults. Fathers do not have rights, mothers do not have rights: they have only responsibilities.

Each child and their family circumstances are different, and it is not therefore appropriate to approach the welfare of the child from definitions of parental rights or notions or presumptions of equal parenting. However, it is right to start from the basis that children benefit from having a meaningful relationship with both parents. When their relationship fails, it is the responsibility of parents to come to arrangements about contact that are in the interests of the child. Of course, in the overwhelming majority of cases they do. Nine out of 10 separating couples agree informal contact. Of the 10 per cent. who have a formal arrangement, 90 per cent. work successfully. It is that small and difficult minority who cannot agree and who ask the courts to resolve their disputes that the Bill attempts to address. But as the Joint Committee report pointed out, in the small minority of cases in which a parent has applied to court, the problems of those families may be complex and not easily resolved through any enforcement measure.

In her excellent speech, my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Margaret Moran) referred to the research done by the university of East Anglia, which has provided an insight into those problems. The parents involved were often young, on low incomes and with very young children. The parents' ability to communicate with each other was limited and the relationships were characterised by a lack of trust, empathy or flexibility, often with high levels of anger. The disputes presented to the courts did not reflect straightforward arguments about contact, but a range of issues and the courts were typically presented with competing his-and-her accounts. Given that, many of these families need support and a facilitative approach to problem solving sustained over a period of time. I welcome the provisions in the Bill that will enable that to happen, including the ability of the court to make contact activity directions. Although it is not clear what those might be exactly, there are several activities that could relate to the promotion of contact, such as attending advice or guidance sessions, including those that give information about the value of meditation—I am sorry, I mean mediation, although meditation might also be useful.

It would make sense to look at basing those contact activities in the new children's centres. The Sure Start project in my constituency already gives advice and information to parents to increase their understanding of children's behaviour and their skills in managing that behaviour. Attendance at such a session might help parents in conflict separate out their needs from those of their children and help to resolve disputes between parents.

I also welcome the expansion of the role of CAFCASS in facilitating and monitoring contact in that supportive approach, but bearing in mind the complexity of the difficulties of some parents, I am pleased that the Government have responded positively to the Joint Committee's recommendations on expanding family assistance orders, which are underused. With the roll-out of children's centres and the establishment of new local children's centres, there will be an opportunity to use all available resources to provide families with help and support not only to resolve contact disputes but to enable better outcomes for children.

We must be clear about the limitations of contact activity directions in dealing with the more complex underlying problems where violence and the fear of violence has been a factor in the separation and continues to be an issue in contact. I very much agree with women's organisations that say that abusive behaviour in a violent relationship cannot be dealt with by parenting classes and that the primary responsibility must be to ensure the safety of the child in any contact arrangements. However, even when a court has decided that contact is in the child's interests, there will be situations where a parent persistently undermines the decision and refuses to co-operate for reasons that have little to do with the child's welfare, so I welcome the new enforcement powers, including the court's being able to direct a parent to do unpaid work and make financial recompense. Courts are reluctant to send a parent with care to jail and those new powers, together with a more facilitative and supportive approach, will mean, I hope, that that does not have to happen.

I am sorry that the Government did not agree to the time and placement requirement recommended by the Joint Committee as a form of bridging order between facilitative contact activities and enforcement orders. It would have enabled the court to direct a parent to be at a designated place for a designated time. The Joint Committee saw great advantages in such orders, as the court could direct a parent to stay in their house while the non-resident parent had contact with the child in another place, thus preventing that parent from undermining the contact arrangement.

Finally, I turn to the provisions on restricting inter-country adoption. I welcome the proposals to set up a list of restricted countries that the Secretary of State deems have bad practices relating to the adoption of children, such as not having proper systems to verify that children are orphans or not attempting to reunite abandoned or lost children with their families. The Government will of course need to ensure that they have good information about what is going on in other countries.

As the Minister will be aware, one of the Joint Committee's recommendations was that the Government take steps to establish an inter-country adoption agency, which we believed would enhance good practice and inform the Government about unsatisfactory practices in countries where children are available for adoption. It would also inform the Government when a country should be placed on the restricted list. As has already been said, there are about 300 applications each year to adopt children from a number of countries, with a few countries receiving the bulk of the applications. Home study reports are prepared by almost as many individual local authority or voluntary organisations as there are countries, so the channels of communication to the DFES from so many agencies cannot be as good as they would be with a small number of specialist agencies, which could network with similar agencies in other countries. The overseas adoption helpline, in its evidence to the Joint Committee, made a good case for pump-priming money to be made available to facilitate the setting up of specialist agencies that would perform a linking or mediation function with the state of origin, and which exist in a majority of countries worldwide.

The overseas adoption helpline argued that the establishment of such agencies would result in a more child-protective system for arrangements for adoption by UK applicants, as the agencies would be accredited by, and accountable to, the proper authorities in the country of origin as well as the relevant central authority in the UK. A network of such agencies would provide a mechanism to monitor adoption practices in situ in those states.

The Government did not accept that recommendation, as they thought it unnecessary. They also pointed to the cost. However, 300 applications a year with a charge to applicants of £5,000 for a home study report indicates that there is already a substantial revenue stream, and the DFES plans to recover some of the administration costs at the rate of a further £800 to £1,000 per head.

In other countries, the costs of inter-country adoption applications, like domestic applications, are borne by the state as it is seen as a service to the child, not to the adopter. We do not take that view in this country.

I would argue, however, that some pump-priming money to set up one or two specialist agencies would be a recognition that, with such complex issues, a degree of specialisation would benefit both the child and the Government. It would also be a good investment for the Government, as it would help to achieve the objectives of the highest practices in inter-country adoption in both this country and the country of origin. I realise that that is outside the Bill's scope, but I hope that Ministers will look at the issue again.

This is a good Bill that will legislate on a difficult issue, and I believe that the Government have achieved a good balance of facilitative and enforcement measures to achieve the objective of ensuring that, as far as possible, separated parents fulfil their responsibilities to their children.

3.20 pm

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to participate in this vital debate, which has been marked by good sense, clarity and shared principles, as exemplified by the speech of the hon. Member for Stockport (Ann Coffey), who clearly knows what she is talking about. For the record, I will confine my remarks to part 1, concentrating on contact orders and the operation of family courts. Other hon. Members may wish to debate the more thorny subject of inter-country adoptions.

I believe that there is a consensus across the House for us to achieve an outcome that is not only practical and pragmatic, but fair and compassionate, with the paramount consideration being the welfare of children, both in theory and practice in statute. I am pleased to say that there is a political will on both sides of the House to put aside party differences and focus on getting the legislation right. We are, of course, dealing not with dry, arcane academic case law, but with people's lives and the future of our children, whose lives may be fractured or broken by the raw emotion and hurt engendered by the disintegration of their families and the growing phenomenon of divorce and separation. As has been mentioned, the trauma and stress of that affects about 200,000 children each year.

I see that the annunciator says that I am "Nick Herbert, Arundel and South Downs", Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that Hansard will amend that.

Two thirds of those children are under 10 years of age. As my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) mentioned, 40 per cent. of children lose contact with the non-resident parents, often as the result of bitter and protracted disputes following separation and divorce.

We agree on much in the Bill. In particular, I welcome the Government's commitment on risk assessments in clause 7, which is supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House. There is a demonstrable need for a more effective method of enforcing contact orders. In so far as Parliament can legislate to change people's lives for the better—as Disraeli may have said in another context, "The elevation of the people"—that is what we are trying to do today. It may not be Catholic emancipation or the abolition of slavery, but we are trying to improve people's lives and to give adults and children a better future, to ameliorate the tragedy of family disintegration.

We agree that, as legislators, we have a duty and responsibility to balance the best of what has gone before, best practice and an evidence-based analysis of the current system with a realisation that there are significant flaws in what passes for the practice of family law today, which is sometimes perceived as ineffectual and certainly perceived by many people as unfair.

I welcome much of the Bill. I support the insertion of the domestic violence perpetrator programme into the Bill and the introduction of risk assessments, especially given the points made eloquently by the hon. Member for Luton, South (Margaret Moran) about circumstances where allegations or proof of abuse are involved. It is right to reform the Children Act 1989 and I am glad that there is recognition that the principle of children maintaining contact with both parents after divorce and separation should be enunciated, even though I might think that is not expressed sufficiently robustly in the Bill.

The recognition that contact orders are meaningless in their practical application without legal sanction is also welcome. Non-compliance cannot and should not be allowed to be tolerated by the courts with impunity. If it is, we risk undermining the whole discharge of family law. The Bill's proposals establish a marker that creates a disincentive for those who would otherwise flout the will of the court. They restore balance to an area hitherto considered wholly biased against the non-resident parent. As has already been said by my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton), giving the court a range of options, such as the early intervention projects, is realistic and sensible. Most importantly, it recognises that all families— parents and children—are different and that a one-size-fits-all approach is inappropriate in this particularly sensitive area. It goes without saying that I welcome the fact that Ministers have supported the decision not to proceed with tagging, which would have been a grotesque and gratuitous overreaction.

The failure—or, if I am being charitable, the non-success—of the family resolution pilots, which were launched and discontinued at a hugely disproportionate cost and which involved low take-up and a lack of compulsion, should not prevent Ministers from being imaginative, especially when reviewing the efficacy of mediation in the package of measures. However, voluntary measures will once again fail. As I mentioned when I intervened on the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), only a legal obligation enacted by the courts will have the desired effect. Academic evidence from Norway, the United States and other countries has shown that that is the case. I hope that that matter will be debated in Committee at length and in detail.

The wider range of options available to the courts, the improvement in the monitoring of contact and—I agree with the hon. Member for Stockport—the enactment of family assistance orders are positive steps. The idea of a legal presumption to promote contact has attracted wide support across parties.

I want to focus on a reasonably small number of areas that concern me and which remain unresolved in the Bill. At the outset I have to say—this may be controversial—that I believe that there is no contradiction between the presumption of co-parenting and the safety of the child or children subject to a contact order. I do not believe that the case has been sufficiently made that a legal presumption is, in general, in any way at odds with the interests of the child or children. I regret that the Government have not sought to strengthen the Children Act 1989 to give legal power to reasonable contact. I will come back to the word "reasonable" later.

Common sense indicates that children desire successful co-parenting after divorce and separation, and are happier and healthier as a result of it. Those children mostly go on to be settled, responsible and decent adults and to be good parents themselves. That is borne out by research by the National Council for One Parent Families in a study by J. Hunt in 2003.

We are attempting to establish, where practicable, a strong and loving relationship between a child and both parents. Noble Lords and Ladies in the other place debated at length—I believe in relation to amendment No. 2—the word "reasonable", which is enshrined in section 34 of the 1989 Act. I would also add "meaningful" as a given. I am glad that the Minister acknowledged in her comments to the Joint Committee the use of the word "meaningful". "Substantial" was mentioned by my colleague, Baroness Morris of Bolton in the other place.

The positions taken by organisations such as Families Need Fathers and children's charities such as Barnardo's and the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, notwithstanding its ill-judged and intemperate comments in its briefing notes, need not be irreconcilable. The presumption is an instrument that gives flexibility to the courts to tailor their decisions accordingly. Evidence shows that it would only formalise the current situation, where very few contact orders are not granted. That in no way invalidates the paramountcy principle in respect of the welfare and interests of the child.

A corollary of this practical approach that the Government have not yet fully acknowledged is the strong argument in favour of a greater role for the child's voice to be heard in court, an argument that some Labour Members have advanced. It is one of the issues in the NSPCC briefing paper with which I agree, so it does not get everything wrong. Perhaps the Minister will touch on why section 122 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002, which provides for children to have a legal and discrete right to be participants and to have separate representation in court, remains unimplemented.

I shall make some tangential comments. There has been consensus but the partisan comments of the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) obscure the issue. We all want children's voices to be taken into account. If an important piece of legislation has been on the statute book for three years and an important section of it remains unenacted, it is surely reasonable for us to ask why that is so.

Vera Baird: Why does the hon. Gentleman not tell us how to do it?

Mr. Jackson: There might be a causal link, given that the Labour party is in Government and the Conservative party is in Opposition. Three years is surely plenty of time to come up with practical and pragmatic approaches to this point, particularly as it has been said that the issue is very important in the context of the proposed legislation.

There is much evidence including that, for example, from the Family Law Journal, under the auspices of the National Youth Advocacy Service. Far from exacerbating the bitterness that is endemic in legal wrangles around contact order disputes, allowing the child's opinion to be heard acts as a catalyst in helping to resolve even the most long-standing and protracted difficult disputes.

On a broader issue, the paramountcy principle is only implicit in the Bill—particularly in clauses 1, 4 and 5—and is not as explicit as it was in the Children Act 1989. The Minister may want to comment on that when she replies.

I return to the sensitive subject of co-parenting and child safety. Thankfully, the awful phenomenon of child murder in contact situations is extremely rare. Although that issue is distressing, it must not obscure the case for co-parenting. More particularly, we should resist recourse to stereotypes. There is no definitive evidence that non-resident fathers per se, as a group, are a greater risk to child safety than substitute non-biological partners or non-biological mothers. In this respect, I deprecate the comments of the NSPCC. It has undermined its kudos as a respected children's charity in putting forward arguments that have no basis in fact and no evidential back-up. Let us remember that many of the dreadful crimes that take place involve not natural or biological fathers, but men brought into the family unit in the wake of divorce or separation. They may have very poor or non-existing parenting skills. At present, unlike the natural or biological father, they are unlikely to have been risk assessed.

May I turn to the issue of compensation via community-based enforcement orders for unpaid work and financial compensation based on affordability? I remain unconvinced that the Government have thought through the practical consequences of the relevant provisions and their impact on CAFCASS, especially the availability of appropriate financial resources and, just as important, the uniformity of resources and facilities across the country. Under clause 7, CAFCASS officers will have a considerably enlarged portfolio of duties, and it is imperative that that does not impact on existing work flows, which are very demanding. I wish to take issue with the Minister, because there have been significant staffing shortfalls, long delays in assigning officers to children and a £4 million cut in funding. As I said in an earlier intervention, the chief executive of CAFCASS, Mr. Anthony Douglas, wrote to me in response to a written question that I had tabled, confirming that one in six private law cases that dealt with parental responsibility, contact orders and residence were unallocated to a staff member.

I pay tribute to the work done in sometimes very trying circumstances by the professional staff of CAFCASS, but there is dissatisfaction with the organisation, including complaints about inadequate time spent with children and institutional bias against non-resident parents. We should be mindful lest inadvertently we make matters worse. I am glad that the hon. and learned Member for Redcar has flagged up her concerns and cited the thematic review. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), too, was concerned about the matter. Like other hon. Members, I await further details from Ministers. No doubt, the issue will be debated at length in Committee. Perhaps the Minister will clarify her rather opaque description of a new and robust statutory framework, and the way in which it will affect funding and resources. Above all, we need proper planning, proper training and a realistic business plan for future CAFCASS workflows.

In conclusion, may I make a plea on behalf of non-resident parents—usually fathers—and praise the invaluable role of the extended family in child care, especially grandparents who, as the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) will agree, are the unsung heroes of our sometimes difficult and dysfunctional families? Grandparents contribute 60 per cent., or £1.1 billion-worth, of child care, yet they have few if any legal rights. I truly hope that the presumption of co-parenting in the Bill and other provisions will redress the balance in favour of fathers, reduce the bitterness inherent in many family courts cases, and have a commensurate positive impact on children. At the moment, non-resident fathers believe that they are on the receiving end of a slow legal system that tends to accept the status quo as a fait accompli, appears hostile to them as a result of their absence and, we should remember, imposes significant costs on them for having the temerity to seek equity and fairness. The most recent figures show that 7,000 court orders are breached every year. At the very least, notwithstanding the recognition in the Bill that non-compliance with court orders will not be tolerated, there must be an assumption by the state that it is responsible for upholding court decisions. That burden should not fall on the impecunious shoulders of individual non-resident parents.

Finally, on grandparents, I declare an interest. I am not a grandparent—I am far too young.

Maria Eagle: No, the hon. Gentleman is not.

Mr. Jackson: Despite her heavy cold, the Minister is as sparky as ever.

I was fortunate to secure an Adjournment debate in Westminster Hall on grandparents' access to grandchildren. The House, and certainly the Minister, will not indulge me if I rehearse the arguments that I deployed in that debate. Suffice it to say that grandparents, especially paternal grandparents, should not be the de facto victims of family breakdown. In that context, I pay tribute to the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who has done so much to keep the issue at the top of the political agenda, like all matters relating to welfare.

I hope that the Minister keeps her word on grandparents and that she will consider the lack of grandparents' legal rights following family disintegration. I hope that she will reconsider section 23 of the 1989 Act, which imposes on local authorities a statutory duty to look first at friends and family in respect of care for children, section 8, which forces grandparents to overcome two hurdles to gain access to their flesh and blood—leave to apply, then a court or care order—and section 17, regarding financial assessment for family and friends acting as carers.

For the most part, I welcome the Bill. It builds on the foundations established by the 1989 Act, which have stood the test of time. I commend the work of colleagues across all parties in the other place. Today, we have an opportunity to help in a small way to prevent the misery and heartache caused by family schism and heartbreak for thousands of children. Let us make the best of that duty and responsibility. With some small caveats, I ask hon. Members to support the Bill on Second Reading.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): I was pleased to hear the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) say that he broadly welcomed the Bill. Although he followed his leader in getting outraged at the NSPCC, he did not follow his leader who said at various points in his speech that the Bill was a wasted opportunity and that it was woefully inadequate. He did not quite say that it needed pulling limb from limb and putting back together again, but his comments were not very far from that. If that is the considered view of the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton)—I do not know that it necessarily is—he is on his own.

The Bill has been through pre-legislative scrutiny. There were a large number of eminent, distinguished, knowledgeable and experienced people from the Conservative side on the Committee and all agreed—there was no dissent, and there was no vote even on the Committee—that the Bill was a benevolent and good measure, subject to the odd caveat, as the hon. Member for Peterborough wisely said. I, in common with the Committee, of which I was privileged to be a member, and most of the Lords in the conversations that they had about the Bill, welcome it.

The Bill's emphasis on early intervention, support, re-tasking CAFCASS away from just reporting on the history and making recommendations to becoming more involved in resolution at an early stage, and the availability of a range of optional projects to help support the right attitude to contact is obviously the right model. Clearly, that must all be properly resourced or it will not work. The Bill offers a sympathetic and rational way forward.

I have three areas of concern, one of which arises from comments from the Opposition, rather than from the Bill—that is, the suggested presumption that there should be joint parenting. I accept entirely that the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham did not speak about an equal split, but if he is speaking about a legal presumption that both parents should be heavily engaged—co-parenting, as the hon. Member for Peterborough said—that worries me immensely. There is a very real difference between that and what Labour Members were discussing when he was speaking and graciously taking interventions—that is, an underlying assumption in the courts which, believe me, does exist and has existed as long as I have been involved in the family courts, that the welfare of the child requires as much contact with both parents as possible. That is a common-sense assumption which underpins what the courts seek to do. However, that is a far cry from a legal presumption in the Bill which states that it is presumed that there will be co-parenting.

A legal presumption can be of two kinds. It can, for instance, be an absolute one, which means that it cannot be knocked over, whatever happens. On the other hand, a legal presumption can be rebuttable—the words are archaic, but we lawyers love them—which means that it can rebutted, but the onus is on somebody to unsettle what is otherwise an edifice of uncrackable law. If one gives such rights to parents, then one is giving rights to bad parents as well as to good parents, and one is also ousting the welfare of the child as the paramount principle.

If we talked about the issue for a long time, nobody would disagree that both parents should be kept involved, if possible. However, if we were to drive the courts into a framework that disciplines them to say, "These people have rights which we cannot easily get round", we would subvert the paramountcy principle and might put children in danger.

Tim Loughton: I am sure that I am not going to agree with the hon. and learned Lady on this point. Why is this issue so different from the rest of the law, in which there is a presumption of innocence until one is proven guilty? Why can there not be an assumption that a parent is a good parent until they are proven not to be, given all the checks and balances in the courts, which this Bill will reinforce? Why would such a presumption undermine the welfare of the child?

Vera Baird: The explanation why such an approach would undermine the paramountcy principle is straightforward. In a situation in which it is not the child but the parents who are battling, the parents are obviously expressing what one might conjure up as the right of the child to have contact with dad, but it is dad who is fighting for that right, so it is his right. Once one makes that the presumption, the welfare of the child cannot be paramount, so the presumption must be ousted in some other way. In that case, one must bring to the surface the danger to the child in order to rebut the presumption, which self-evidently means that the presumption of paramountcy is not coming first. I would never agree to that proposal, which is not only technically nonsense, but wrong. It could be extremely dangerous, too, because it would oblige courts to give too many rights to bad parents, which is not what any of us want.

Tim Loughton: Why are they wrong in America, Australia, Canada and Italy? And how has that wrongness manifested itself in gross harm to the welfare of children, because I am not aware of the evidence on that point?

Vera Baird: The hon. Gentleman is not comparing like with like. I am unaware of any legal system that includes a legal presumption of the type to which he has referred. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) discussed the ability to put a presumption into the welfare checklist, but that is not a legal presumption. Most family law systems in societies resembling ours will be based on such a presumption, which is not a legally binding presumption of the kind mentioned by the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham—I hope that he eventually gets why he is wrong.

Child contact is a child-protection issue, and there are dangers. This Government, more than any previous Government, have recognised domestic violence as a serious issue that has been hidden for many years, that is very hard to get the measure of and that is seriously under-reported. That point applies to male domestic violence, too, which the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham and I have discussed before. I talk about domestic violence against women because the vast majority of domestic violence involves women, but there is domestic violence by brother on brother, father on brother, brother on father, gay partner on gay partner and women on men. In every situation it is a hidden problem that needs teasing out, because, as it is wrapped up in a relationship, it is not easy to speak freely about it.

In this connection, though, it mostly concerns women. The statistics suggest that 750,000 children witness domestic violence annually. Seventy-five per cent. of children who are on the at-risk register for their own safety live with domestic violence, and up to 66 per cent. of children suffer physical violence from a perpetrator who is attacking the mother but also at some point attacks the child. In the criminal justice system, the point where the parties separate is now well recognised as being one of enhanced danger when the violence tends to increase because the perpetrator appreciates that he is losing his grip and tries to use even greater force to bring the person back into the fold. However, that is not half as well recognised in the family sector. When domestic violence is recognised in family courts, it is generally regarded as having come to an end when the couple has split, not as a continuing issue. It is often undervalued because it is perceived as a tactic in a fight.

The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham, whom I know does not think as his words suggest, talked about the need to be rigorous and punitive about false allegations in court. Everybody agrees with that, but he cited only false allegations of domestic violence.

[Vera Baird]

That is a slightly partisan view. Of course, in heated situations where there is a child to play for, more unscrupulous parents make all sorts of allegations against one another, but there is not a high incidence of false allegations about domestic violence, although there is a great deal of it.

Those of us who sat on the Joint Committee that scrutinised the draft Bill had the benefit of the scrutiny unit statistician's figures about a whole range of related issues. In the year for which he gave us figures—I think that it must have been 2003–04—out of 40,000 contested custody cases, 13,000 concerned issues of safety, of which 5,500, or nearly half, concerned child abuse or neglect and the other 7,000 or so domestic violence. It is therefore utterly vital that the child's welfare is paramount and that that cannot be changed. I am pleased that the Government cling to that position and will continue to do so. The question is whether the Bill goes far enough to guarantee the safety of the large number of vulnerable children and domestic violence victims who are present in the statistics.

The Government would say that those worries are adequately addressed by the welfare checklist in the Children Act 1989, the extension of the definition of "harm" to include impairment due to seeing or hearing ill-treatment of another, and the new family court application forms that try to ensure that domestic violence is put at the top of the list so that cases can be verified and dealt with at the outset. However, the joint charities grouping, which consists of a large number of pressure groups concerned with children, including the NSPCC, suggests that there is no clear requirement to ensure that contact is safe. We recommended—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Order. I am not sure that the hon. and learned Lady's microphone is working. Until we are sure that it is, perhaps she would like to speak up a little.

Vera Baird: I am sorry. It is rare for me to be accused of not speaking loudly enough. I referred to and commended two recommendations that we made in Committee. They consist of checking the safety of the child at every stage. I mentioned the thematic review, which showed that CAFCASS paid

"a worrying lack of attention to safety planning in almost all the observed sessions".

I was pleased that the Minister said that CAFCASS is now receiving plenty of resources. It will have to change its culture if it is to move from report writing to active solution seeking. It needs beefing up.

The thematic review makes the point that if we have existed with a family court system in which the stars representing the social workers, the sense of both sides to a dispute and the expertise acquired has never paid sufficient attention to safety planning, that speaks volumes about keeping children's safety paramount. Even the officers charged with the task of recommending welfare outcomes have not had that requirement as high on their agenda as they should.

My second concern about the Bill is the absence of the paramountcy principle from the provisions that deal with enforcement against a recalcitrant parent. Clearly, the point is to enforce, but orders for contact can only be prospective. The judge works out the likely way in which it will happen but events can call safety into question. For example, something could alarm the mother or make the child afraid so that it does not want to go, and she says, "I won't go through with it." At that point, enforcement is directed at dealing with her. If the paramountcy of the interest of the child is lost then, we lose a good deal of the point of the Bill. That is deeply worrying.

An individual needs to be punished but that should not undermine the paramountcy of the child. We are back to the point that the Bill is intended to tackle. The courts do not easily send a primary carer to prison because that is bad for the child and we are trying to get away from that model. The courts might express concern that, if they make someone do unpaid work at a time when they would otherwise take the child to a football match or do something nice, it undermines the welfare of the child. However, I believe that we could give the courts a strong steer and emphasise using reasonably civilised means to enforce an order, which the court remains assured is in the interests of the child. That model is compatible with the paramountcy of the welfare of the child. If that does not remain at the top of the agenda, we are worried that punishing the person will be put first and the child's welfare will be lost along the way. I hope that those who serve on the Committee can ensure that the paramountcy principle is included in the relevant provisions.

Section 122 of the Adoption and Children Act 2002 about representation for children has been mentioned. It has not been implemented and I understand some of the criticism from Conservative Back Benchers. There is no doubt that all the joint charities believe that it is crucial that the courts hear and understand the child's wishes and feelings about the circumstances to help them decide what would be safe for the child, yet the Bill neither implements section 122 nor orders separate representation when there is risk.

The lobby groups say that separate representation should be considered in all cases where there is a risk and that courts should ascertain children's views in all cases. In principle, I agree strongly. However, I ask a question that I hope will be considered in a broader context than simply that of the Bill. How do we do that?

In cases involving an older child, we can get the kid to give evidence if we have to, although that is not necessarily desirable. Such evidence could certainly feed into a social worker's report in some way. But what about the younger children? And what about the 5,500 out of every 40,000 who are subject to the threat of child abuse or a lack of safety? They need to be able to make an input into the question of contact, and they need to be able to articulate what has happened to put their safety in danger. That can be hugely difficult.

That question is reflected in the criminal justice system, where case after case is brought involving allegations of abuse of young children, usually as a result of physical evidence, which might not be totally compelling, or concerns about the child not thriving. In other cases, a sibling might have said something, or the child might have said something to mum or dad to cause real concern. But how can a child be facilitated to express what has happened to them, and to give that kind of evidence, which is highly material to a prosecution but equally material to the tortured issue of contact where there might have been child abuse?

There is a provision in the Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Act 1999 for intermediaries to be supplied to help people who cannot communicate in the normal way to put their evidence before a court. That is used for a variety of vulnerable groups. I had the privilege a few weeks ago of visiting the Barnardo's Bridgeway project in Redcar. The project deals with what it calls troubled children. These are children who are suspected to have been abused. Its primary role is to unearth what has really happened, in order to help the child to deal with it and to give them counselling. It is that unearthing of what has happened, by using very clever methods, and then being satisfied as a professional that is has indeed happened, so as to know how to tackle it through the right kind of counselling, that offers a potential medium for getting complaints of child sex abuse before the courts.

I had a pretty limited opportunity to get to the depths of how those professionals work. Through the use of toys, books and pictures of a specific kind, they try to get the child to go back through the experience, to see whether they respond to anything that registers that they have had an abusive experience. For instance, rather than asking a child a complex question such as, "How did you feel when that happened to you?", they have puppets that represent different emotions. This is just one example of how ingenious these methods are and the potential that they hold. The child would be asked which puppet was there at the time of the experience, and they might hold up the sad puppet or the angry puppet to show that that was how they felt. Or they might hold up the happy puppet, which would show that there was nothing to worry about.

I am not suggesting that we use puppets in court—I think that my colleagues in the legal profession might be a bit worried about that. However, I am suggesting that we all have a big responsibility, in confronting the inability to get children's testimony in these cases, to consider how those kids are not being protected because their testimony cannot be brought forward, and to examine some of these very clever methods, including those being used in the Barnardo's Bridgeway project. We need to acknowledge that, if they represent a well researched and methodologically sound way of getting reliable information about child abuse out of a child, so that an expert can then report it in court, that could be a way forward. I do not blame the Government for not introducing that part of the earlier Bill. It is easy to say that there should be separate representation in all circumstances, but a lot of questions remain about how exactly that should be achieved.

I welcome the Bill immensely. My only reservation is whether we have put safety sufficiently at a premium. Let us cleave to the paramountcy principle at every stage, and let us not lose sight of the opportunity that the Bill offers us to open the door into the world in which some children—not all, but a substantial proportion, as the figures show—suffer from abuse and from the spin-offs of domestic violence. Let us give serious thought to how we can, from now on, try harder to get children's voices properly heard.

4.4 pm

Mr. Eric Pickles (Brentwood and Ongar) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to make a modest contribution to the debate. It is a particular pleasure to follow the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). I hope she will forgive me if I do not pursue some of her excellent points, as I want to concentrate on a narrower aspect of the Bill, namely adoption. I want to say something about the secrecy of the family court. I think that some of the general rules on adoption concerning foreign nations are relevant to our own system. A particularly sad case in which I have been involved over the last few months has a direct bearing on how adoption works in practice, especially forced adoption, the most extreme of the many issues that we must consider.

My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) described the Under-Secretary of State as sparky. I am not sure that I can follow him down that avenue, but I want to record my enormous appreciation for the courtesy that she has shown me in connection with that case and my concerns about adoption. We have had three formal meetings and many more informal meetings. The Under-Secretary has changed my views on a number of important issues. She has also reinforced some of my prejudices, which is a nice feeling—but I am genuinely grateful to her, and grief-stricken by the fact that she is plainly suffering from a heavy cold. I wish her a quick recovery.

As I have said, I am concerned about the secrecy of the family court. I tabled an early-day motion on the subject. Looking around the Chamber earlier, I noted that almost every Member present, apart from Ministers and, obviously, the occupant of the Chair, had signed it. Early-day motion 869, entitled "Workings of the Children Act 2004", stated:

> "That this House urges the Government to remove the veil of secrecy from the workings of the Children Act 2004; considers that the closed door policy of the family courts breeds suspicion and a culture of secrecy which does nothing to instil confidence in those using them, which affects not just the courts but the social services departments of local authorities; and believes that it is possible to preserve the anonymity of children involved in the proceedings without the cumbersome rules which obstruct parents from receiving advice and support, which in particular works to the disadvantage of parents with special learning difficulty."

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar spoke about the concept of the rights of the child being paramount. Her explanation was a good deal clearer than some that I have received from social services departments. However, I am less concerned with the effect on the courts than with the effect on social services. There is almost a process of Chinese whispers, whereby that noble concept becomes bastardised into an unwillingness to disclose, to justify, to listen to arguments, or even to see a need to explain decisions. The law was changed because of Members' difficulties in obtaining information from social services departments. At one time, they were threatened with contempt proceedings and prosecutions for pursuing constituency cases. Since the beginning of April last year, however, we have been able to look at case files and discuss the issues. I may be wrong but I think that I was the first Member of Parliament to take advantage of that, after a constituent who was going through the process brought it to my attention in the early part of April last year.

[Mr. Eric Pickles]

The change in the law seems to have wholly passed by Essex social services department. Despite the will of the House and the change in the law, it led me through quite an elaborate dance when I wanted to get some basic information from it. At one point, it insisted that I went to court to get special permission, when by Act of Parliament I already had that right. Had it not been for my noble Friend Lord Hanningfield, who happens to be the leader of Essex county council, I do not think that I would have been able to pursue the case to the full.

I cannot go into the details of the case, but I can talk about it in the abstract and discuss the way it affects the law. It concerned the decision by Essex social services to remove two children from a family because they considered the mother to be stupid and incapable of bringing up the children because of her lack of intellect. The mother had an IQ of around 60. Social services sought to present her as stupid to the point of being unable to understand maternal feelings. In my view, she was a little slow but someone who clearly loved her two children. She was faced with an unending stream of social workers dealing with her case—at one point, I counted 16—who were pushing her in different directions. She was left bewildered and unable adequately to rebut social services' allegations. I want to say a few things about people with learning difficulties and then move to the general question of social services. I want to stay firmly within the terms of the Bill.

A problem has been identified recently with the Meadow case. I do not want to go down that route but it illustrates the fact that, sometimes, proceedings have been initiated because hospital consultants or social workers have been a little over-zealous. It is typical for the person who initiates proceedings to see the complaint through. There is a need for a separation of powers between those who take the decision to initiate an investigation and those who actually conduct it. I am worried—I will come to this a little later—about the targets for adoption and the obvious financial benefits that accrue.

The principal problem is that social services departments cannot be entirely non-partisan in the way in which they identify the issues. Few people who initiate a serious chain of events are likely to admit it when it goes wrong. The temptation is to tailor evidence to fit the complaint. That should be resisted.

I can give a few brief examples of how that happens. As I said, I think that I was almost certainly the first MP to go through the process of wading through a social services file concerned with a forced adoption. It was thick, repetitive and at times confusing. I have talked to the Minister about that. I speak as a former chairman of a social services department and was used to seeing that kind of thing. I was shocked at the sloppiness of record keeping, the shoddiness of the process and the basic injustice. In that file—this is directly relevant—there was misinformation, embellishment and inappropriate assigning of motives.

I shall give just two examples, which illustrate the general problem. In the first example, the husband did not have learning difficulties but was, by mistake, described as having them. The mistake was recognised and corrected in the file but subsequently, such allegations continued to be made, as though it was a proven fact. More seriously, it was suggested that the child had witnessed domestic violence. It became clear that this was a single incident in which the husband, in a moment of pique, had picked up his slippers and thrown them against the wall. He is a gentle and passive man and at no time were the slippers aimed at anybody; nor was any damage caused, except, perhaps, for a slight mark on the wall. However, the file on that family states that the female child "has witnessed domestic violence and this will have an impact towards her development".

Following close scrutiny on my part, social workers told me that there was no evidence of any violence toward either child in the family. No doctors or casualty departments had expressed concern, and there was no evidence of repeated accidents involving the children. Yet the allegation remained on the file.

An allegation was also made of poor parenting and I asked for various examples. I was given two. First, the female child had been given sandwiches and a packet of crisps for her lunch, and because she chose to eat the crisps first, she was too full to eat her sandwiches. That was deemed sufficiently important to be regarded as an example of poor parenting. The second example—we should bear in mind that at this point, I was pressing for another such example—involved allowing one of the children to stay up late at night to watch television. I asked whether "late" meant 10 o'clock at night, or perhaps 9 o'clock. I was told that she was allowed to stay up until 8 o'clock to watch the end of "EastEnders" or "Coronation Street". I have many middle-class friends with children of a similar age who are allowed to have crisps and to stay up until 8 o'clock. None of them is subject to a care order.

I turn to the issue of stories being embellished. By this point, the social worker was finding me a tad provocative. He said that the mother had screwed up a baby-wipe tightly in her fist and had repeatedly rubbed it against the genitals of the young male child, to the extent that they were "red raw." However, the report actually said that the mother had used heavy pressure, and that the genitals were flattened and "very red". There is a world of difference between "red raw" and discoloured.

I found distressing the way in which motives were ascribed in the report, without any obvious discipline. The father was criticised because he had refused to leave his job of some 23 years to become the full-time carer. It was said that that showed a lack of commitment. I believe that holding down a job—in his case, a humble job—for 23 years and putting bread on the table week in, week out sets a fine example to one's children. The social workers wanted the father to live off benefits. That might have been a solution, but if someone can set an example to their children by working hard, that is something to be proud of.

I want to return to the way in which the primacy rule can be bastardised. I confess that by this time I was beginning to irritate people, although I am sure that hon. Members will find that hard to believe. I found myself being lectured by a very senior person whom I shall not name, as that would be embarrassing. He said, "We have to consider the welfare of the child. That is absolutely paramount; whatever is best for the child is what we do."

I replied, "OK, but if that rule is applied generally, let's apply it to your children. If I arranged for them to live in the house of Mr. Bill Gates, they would get enormous intellectual stimulation—probably more than you can offer—and they would certainly enjoy much greater financial well-being." The very senior person did not seem to like that, which made me glad that I had not used my second choice of example—Michael Jackson.

I have talked these matters through with people who really understand them. They have said, "Look, Eric, what about the guardian? The guardian is there to look after the interests of children and to be impartial in the process."

I put that approach to various leading counsel with an interest in the matter. Although some guardians may exist who are prepared to stand up to social services departments and act as bastions of freedom, they are very hard to find. Generally speaking, guardians act as cheerleaders for social services departments. They are entirely compliant, and seem incapable of doing more than being a cheering section.

I had the opportunity last night to speak about such problems to the Under-Secretary and I shall give one example of the role of guardians. A leading counsel on these matters—who, by the nature of things, acts sometimes for the local authority and sometimes for parents—told me about one occasion when he was acting for the local authority. Just before proceedings began, people started to gather round the table. He was not paying attention to who came through the door, and was about to begin his contribution when he noticed that the guardian was sitting in the room. "What are you doing here?" he asked, to which the guardian replied, "Well, you know, I'm here as part of the team."

That person should not have been in the room, because the guardian's presence could demonstrate partiality. The system needs to make sure that the different strands of the process can be separated.

I was enormously surprised to find that there is no national system for the regulation or disciplining of social workers. No royal charter exists that sets out professional standards or disciplinary procedures and thus allows peer judgment to take place. The social work profession needs to address that defect. The solution does not need to be elaborate, but peer evaluation among social workers on relevant matters is important. Without that, there is enormous variation between authorities, which can be as slack as the one involved in the Climbié case, or as tough as Rochdale in the face of ridiculous accusations of satanism.

I shall quote briefly from Andrew Scott, an admittedly newly qualified barrister who deals with these matters on a daily basis. I suspect that he may be known to some hon. Members, as he has made quite a reputation for himself. He said:

"I don't think the public appreciates how low the threshold is. When children are taken from their parents, it is not because there is a certainty of future harm or even that, on the balance of probabilities, those children could be harmed. It is enough that there will be a possibility of future harm. If there is a 70 per cent. risk of a child being harmed and every child with that risk was taken into care then, in 100 such cases, 30 children would be taken from families where they would come to no harm. Sometimes, I wonder whether children are being protected, or whether it is social workers' careers."

Those are wise words. There may be a temptation for local authorities, possibly because of the financial advantage, to move towards adoption when other solutions may be possible.

Mr. Scott goes on to say:

"There's an unspoken fear that children from poor backgrounds are being freed up for middle-class adopters."

I would like to give an illustration which, of all the features of the case, has really chilled me. It is about the question of duty of care. In the April before the children were finally taken with a view to an enforced adoption, there was a case conference. The second child had not yet been born. The conference was considering whether to put the child on the at-risk register. The daughter was already on it. On the basis of the facts before it, the conference decided that it was not necessary to put the young boy on the register and furthermore that it was appropriate to take the young girl off it. Somebody at that conference, notably the chairman, did not like that decision. There was no change of circumstances and no other substantial incidents had taken place. Yet the same circumstances were seen as making it appropriate to put the children into care with a view to permanent adoption.

Let me say what I think needs to be done. Those who investigate a complaint must be independent of those who initiate it and those who may in due course be called on to care for the children. A proper code of conduct for social workers is long overdue. I certainly believe that those with special learning difficulties deserve special care. We are told that in 1 per cent. of all families one partner or the other has learning difficulties. We are also told that 20 per cent. of children in care have one parent with learning difficulties. There is some dispute over the figures, but whether they are precisely right or not, they demonstrate a problem.

The secrecy of the family courts needs to be opened up. We wait for the consultation document. I believe that there is a strong case for judgments to be published and that they can be published while retaining the anonymity of the child. I have one additional suggestion. It goes back to the Meadow case. There is a question whether the professional witnesses should be identified. If the Government take the decision that they should, I will generally support that. Once you become involved in a case you get e-mails from all over the country. Some are heartbreaking, but they all have strong emotion running through them. Very normal people sometimes become irrational. I recognise that there might be a problem obtaining witnesses if they are routinely named.

As an absolute minimum, each professional witness should be given a unique identifying number. I think that that is important—I suspect that hon. Members understand—because we need to establish a pattern so that if we get a problem with the veracity of a witness we can have another look at them.

We need to change the rules with regard to advice. Parents are put in the dreadful position of being unable to seek advice. They cannot talk to their county council or unitary authority; they cannot talk to friends or members of their family. Only recently could they come and talk to us. I can give examples of where there is a problem. In care or adoption proceedings it is understandable that parents want to take a fair amount of time off. Under the existing rules, parents cannot tell their employer why they are absent from work without going back to the court. Psychiatric evaluations are also often necessary in such proceedings, but people cannot make full disclosure without first going back to the court. We have to find ways to solve those problems, and I wholeheartedly endorse the Committee's recommendations for greater transparency.

It might be slightly controversial to say so, but some cases resemble attempts to make bricks without straw. Once the facts have been established, the courts are reluctant to revisit those facts or their interpretation. However, if adoption has resulted from fraud or seriously erroneous evidence, we should have a procedure to enable that adoption to be overturned, although the period in which that could be done should be limited. In care proceedings, any carer who is accused of abuse should have an automatic entitlement to legal aid; the opportunity to instruct an expert of their choosing; a right of appeal against any findings; and legal aid for any appeal.

I am grateful for the opportunity to raise these issues, but I wish to make one final point. I hope to be a Member of Parliament for many years to come—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Well, that is marvellous and makes me feel wonderful. However, the case I have described will haunt me, because a grave injustice has been done and the system has let those people down. Those two young people now live in my constituency in a flat that is spotlessly clean and well maintained, with a bedroom full of toys that their children will never see. The beds are made up and presents are waiting for them. While there will be an attempt to overturn the original care proceedings, everyone understands that the likelihood of reversal is not great. When the state intervenes in people's lives, we must ensure that it does so fairly. In the case that I have dealt with over the past few months, that intervention was "intervention beyond the humane."

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Child contact disputes can be tremendously painful and affect everyone involved in them. They can leave long-lasting damage in their wake, so it is in everyone's interest to keep them to a minimum. For families, it is a deeply personal and private decision whether parents should live together or separate, and, if they separate, what arrangements should be made for caring for their children. We—as the decision makers—and the agencies and courts that affect those people's lives should be very aware of the difficulties that people have in engaging with the state when they have to make those private decisions.

I have often wondered about the preparations that we make for having children. I cannot recall going on a parenting course and I have never had any help with the tricky questions that have arisen from time to time as I have raised my children. People have expected that I will naturally know what to do because I am a parent. That is the case for many people.

As we consider how, through the Bill, we can reduce the number of painful disputes and the severity of those that we cannot eliminate, the starting point for our deliberations should be much further back. The Bill may not be able to cover some of my interests, such as a universal parenting support service, but we should remember that services for parents in difficulty are woefully inadequate. There is some preparation. The external assessment process for adopting and foster parents may prepare them for what is to come. Some people attend marriage preparation courses, during which they may give some thought to their future duties and responsibilities as parents.

I want to draw the House's attention to a little-celebrated change in the law eight years ago, whereby unmarried parents who jointly register the birth of their child both acquire the joint parental responsibility automatically accorded to married parents under the Children Act 1989. Many people have overlooked that change. I asked my local register office why we could not have a ceremony to mark the registration of a birth and was told that there was one but not many people asked for it. Such a ceremony could be an occasion for parents not only to celebrate the joy and pleasure that they will derive from parenthood, but to learn a little about their duties and responsibilities, which is relevant to our debate about parents' responsibilities for the welfare of their child when they are in dispute.

The Children Act is that rare bird—a good law passed by a Conservative Government. We should recognise the success of a long lasting, wise law. The concept of joint parental responsibility, much overlooked in today's debate, has been extremely successful. The statistic has become hackneyed in our debate today, but in nine out of 10 cases parents who separate come to their own agreement about the future care of their children, because they exercise their joint parental responsibility. Most of our focus has been on some of the cases in the other 10 per cent. The existing law is sound, but some of the practices about which we have heard today are unacceptable. We need to give thought to them in designing legislation to improve the situation.

When parents separate, children benefit from a continuing relationship with both of them, provided that it is safe. The Children Act makes the welfare of the child rather than the rights of the parent the paramount consideration for the family courts. Both parents have equal status and equal value in the eyes of the court. When I was involved in such a case as a lawyer, the court was certainly gender-neutral.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford) (Con): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kidney: I am happy to give way to the newcomer to the debate.

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, although I am not that much of a newcomer as I have been in the Chamber for almost an hour.

There is a slight problem with the hon. Gentleman's use of the word "equal". When people separate and try to set up arrangements for their children, under existing law—whatever lawyers may say—it is in fact the mother who has care of the children and will decide when the father sees them. That is why many agreements are made without problem. Fathers fully understand that they cannot fight in the court for a 50:50 arrangement because the court will not give it to them.

Mr. Kidney: I respect the hon. Gentleman's opinion, if what he has just said is his opinion. However, I profoundly disagree with everything that he says about the assumptions that fathers and courts make. I think that he is wrong on both counts.

Mr. Burns: I do not know the hon. Gentleman's background and whether he has ever been put in such a position, but may I tell him that, for most fathers who have found themselves in that position and have had to negotiate a deal, what I have said in my earlier intervention is, in fact, the case?

Mr. Kidney: I do not want to extend this discussion, but for 20 years I was a practising solicitor in the family courts and dealt with a great many cases that involved divorce and the care of children. My experience in those 20 years was that the two situations that the hon. Gentleman describes were very infrequently relevant factors in the cases in which I was involved.

The law is clear, but the current systems for resolving disputes must be improved, which is what we set out to achieve with the Bill. There is clearly a need for specialist family services to provide support as part of the overall system with which I want to deal, and even for compulsory family services for some families, such as those in conflict, those with addictions and, perhaps, mental health difficulties, and certainly in cases of family violence.

In general, in cases where disputes that involve children occur during the breakdown of a relationship between the parents, the first port of call should be mediation. We need not wait for a breakdown in communication before mediation takes place. It is a structured process, whereby a couple are helped by an impartial third party—the mediator—to negotiate their own decisions for the long-term benefit of their children.

Research has shown that five hours of mediation can promote sustained contact and an ongoing relationship between parents and their children. A long-term study of outcomes in the USA was referred to in a briefing that we have received from National Family Mediation and which resulted in a book called, "The Truth about Children and Divorce" by Robert Emery, who says that, 12 years after the event, 30 per cent. of parents who had attended mediation were still in weekly contact with their children, as against just 7 per cent. who had been through litigation.

Mediation should be, in the words of National Family Mediation, the routine method for resolving child contact disputes early if the family have not already reached their own agreement. I agree with the Grandparents Association that mediation should also be available to grandparents and other relatives who have been involved in children's care.

I asked a question earlier about the funding of mediation, because that is relevant if there are barriers to something that could be successful and save costs downstream. Publicly funded solicitors' clients are required to consider mediation unless it is unsafe—for example, because of an allegation of domestic violence—before they can go on to receive further legal help with their court cases. In the past, they may have received legal aid. For those clients, mediation is free. No contribution is required from them, and there is no suggestion of a statutory charge being placed on their property after the case has finished.

Andrew Selous: In the hon. Gentleman's experience of cases where such matters come to court, do the courts sufficiently take into account the importance to the child of grandparental and other extended family relationships, or are they not considered sufficiently seriously by the courts?

Mr. Kidney: The point that I want to pursue in a little while is that the enemies of dissatisfied parents, grandparents and wider family members are usually obstacles that are nothing to do with what the court would decide if it had a fair opportunity to make the decision. Those obstacles are things such as cost, which I am about to mention, and whether those people can get into the proceedings.

Delay in the court process is also an obstacle. By the time that a judge makes the final decision some way down the line, circumstances may have changed so much that what everyone thought would be a fair outcome a year earlier no longer seems appropriate. I want to talk about how to sweep away the obstacles of cost and delay to get a fair outcome. It is my experience that if grandparents can get themselves in front of the court, their argument gets a fair hearing.

I was explaining how a person with legal assistance gets all the mediation for free, but a person who does not qualify for legal aid gets none of it for free. A person who already thinks that that is unfair and that, if the mediation does not work, lawyers in the court case will have to be paid, will worry that mediation involves a wasted cost and will be reluctant to incur that in the first place. The first thing to address is: if mediation is such a successful route and might save lots of costs later, is it not worth investing something in the mediation process for both parties to make it an attractive solution for the early resolution of disputes?

I would need to be in the position of the Minister and her officials and have the budget in front of me to make an assessment on the actual design. There are a number of choices. We could continue to load the cost on to the parents with a system of assistance from public funds, depending on how low the parents' income was, or we could have a publicly funded system, but with contributions from some parents, in the way in which NHS dental contracts now require contributions from some patients. Either way, we need to remove the obstacle.

If mediation has not been tried or has been tried and failed, the courts will be involved. The Children Act 1989 states clearly, very early on, that any delay is likely to prejudice the welfare of the child. It is my experience that that is definitely so and, unfortunately, that that happens too often. The Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mr. Kidney]

Lewisham, East (Bridget Prentice), in answer to a question from me, wrote that Government-commissioned research shows that "almost a quarter of cases lasted over a year or arose following previous proceedings".

She continued:

"almost a quarter of cases have two or more repeat applications and about a third of these are the result of enforcement issues, while over a half are ... driven by the need to have a previous order updated."—[Official Report, 28 November 2005; Vol. 440, c. 170W.]

My central argument is that such delay distorts the decisions that judges can make at the end of the case because new situations might develop in the time that it takes to get there. Sometimes the delay in effect decides for the judge what the outcome can be. That does not seem like the fair solution that people thought that they would get when they started court proceedings much earlier.

What does the Bill do to reduce delay? On its own, it is silent about that, but it introduces a new power to direct parties to undertake a contact activity—information sessions, classes and counselling. It is possible that that could be the first thing that a court orders immediately after somebody applies for a decision. In that instance, if something comes of the information sessions, classes and counselling, it might bring about an early resolution of the dispute and achieve a satisfactory outcome for both parties. That will depend on the order being used and resourced so that things happen quickly, as well as whether the parties feel that they get sufficient help through that route to resolve their dispute. Clearly, the approach will not work if parties retain hardened attitudes.

On the resources to make the approach work, it has been mentioned in the debate that, in some parts of the country, there are contact centres and admirable voluntary schemes where such work is undertaken very well. Mention has also been made of the Children and Family Court Advisory and Support Service. I hesitate to say that CAFCASS will make that approach work because we have also heard that it has to carry out the new risk assessments, administer the reformed family assistance orders, presumably carry on its current role regarding inquiries and reports to courts and, hopefully, fully resource its public law cases, which are an important priority for it.

I do not know how many other Members have received a briefing from the probation officers' trade union—the National Association of Probation Officers—that describes a budget crisis at CAFCASS last summer, management cuts this year and a stand-still budget next year. That does not sound like the basis for CAFCASS being in a position to help us to make a success of the new orders and thereby reduce the delay that is causing so much harm in some cases. If delay continues, the current dissatisfaction, of which we are all well aware, will grow.

Some say that there is an alternative in the approach of early interventions. I found the explanation for early interventions in an article in the Family Law Journal, family law 455. It refers to a report of a seminar in London in April 2003 called "Early Interventions—Towards a Pilot Project". It contains many references to the presentation that day from the Florida judge, John Lendermann, under the title "How and Why Most American States Changed to Early Interventions". His article describes how it was based on a statutory requirement for frequent and continuing contact founded on child development research. He said that children did better when both parents were kept in their lives. He added that the basis of the whole scheme is well publicised in parenting plans setting out cycles of contact in the average case.

I have some difficulty with the concept of the average case. The problem with these few cases is how highly individualised they are in terms of the needs and demands of the parties to them. Nevertheless, the judge said that the combination meant that American parents knew what sort of orders the courts might make in the absence of exceptional circumstances, and that by implication they concentrated more on making a success of the alternative. It is clear from that description, as it should be in this country, that allegations of domestic violence should be taken out of the process immediately and dealt with separately by courts.

In the judge's scheme in Florida, the remaining cases are streamed through a two-stage process. The first is that separated parents are mandated—I think that that means that they are made—to go to group parent educational classes where their post-separation responsibilities to their children and each other are explained to them. They are given the opportunity to agree a parenting plan and exit system. For the remainder—what the judge describes as resistant parents—he says that they are obliged to attend a single session of contact-focused mediation. He says also that Florida has a standard standing temporary order, which is issued in every case, binding the parties to maintain contact prior to the first hearing. The judge describes in his article that therefore only a minority of cases, mostly involving serious issues, need further intervention. Florida's overall caseload was up and costs were down. Enforcement was a rarity and delay was negligible. Most disputes were resolved within a few weeks.

There are some difficulties in what is described. When the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, gave the House his presentation, I thought that he was trying to move towards a situation in this country where costs would be down, enforcement a rarity and delay negligible. That is an outcome that I would like very much to achieve with him. However, I do not think that the Bill will achieve all of those things. We need to consider what more might be needed.

As a summary of my view, I think that there should be robust systems for screening for domestic violence. There should be specific procedures to deal with those cases once they are identified. We should hear the families' views, including the children's views. We should certainly consider the separate representation of children in appropriate cases. We need to identify those cases where continuing contact has already been shown to be in the beginning of the case in the child's best interests, and there is a danger that that continuing contact will cease unless something is done at the early stage of the case and not at the end of it. That was the point that I wanted to raise.

The more that I listen to this debate, the more I appreciate how crucial the new amendment in the other place could be for risk assessment, which will be undertaken if clause 7 becomes part of the Act. I have described both domestic violence cases and cases in which contact should clearly be maintained during court proceedings, otherwise it would be lost and a decision made against the court's wishes. All those things can be identified in a robust risk assessment and targeted approaches designed as a result, and I hope that that will happen in future. Children's welfare certainly includes protection from physical and psychological harm, so our systems of dispute resolution must be vigilant so that they can detect cases of domestic violence. It is important not to put parents in danger, even at the early stage, as I mentioned, of mediation, and certainly not during the proceedings. It is important not to put children at risk of harm through contact before the risk assessment is made.

The new family court application forms will protect children from domestic violence, as will the extension of the definition of harm to include impairment due to seeing or hearing ill-treatment of another. Following the amendment that was made in the House of Lords, we have gone further in the Bill and introduced risk assessments. We have made attendance on domestic violence perpetrator programmes a possible condition of contact, but we still need to ensure that there is an assessment before every step of the proceedings and that we act on the result, so that there is clear reporting and prioritising of cases.

We have limited enforcement powers, including fines and imprisonment for contempt of court, but those powers are not often used, for the reasons that hon. Members have given. The courts will be able to order community-based enforcement, unpaid work and financial compensation paid by one party to another, but there are many uncertainties about the new powers, some of which we have discussed. While I support the extension of enforcement powers, those uncertainties reinforce my strong view that we must sweep away obstacles that arise early in the process, such as delay and cost, so that we can deal with more disputes more effectively.

Part 2 deals with adoption. The Joint Committee that considered the draft Bill and the Joint Committee on Human Rights both recommended that the Bill should require the Secretary of State to pay particular regard to the United Nations convention on the rights of the child when deciding whether to impose special restrictions suspending inter-country adoptions from a particular country. I very much agree with that suggestion, which would provide an important safeguard to ensure that the power to issue special restrictions is exercised in conformity with, and in support of, the convention.

The Bill is necessary because of the difficulties relating to some contact disputes, as we well know. It goes in the right direction, as most speakers have said. It has been improved in the other place and, in my view, it could be improved still further in the House. My strong wish is that we continue this debate in Committee and hammer out a position from those that have been articulated today to make the Bill much better and much more effective in reducing those disputes.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): May I begin by commending the Minister for Children and Families, my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton), who spoke on behalf of the official Opposition and, indeed, all hon. Members on the tone and manner of their contributions? These are emotional issues and there are many different perspectives on them, but everyone who has spoken today has made a considered contribution. Indeed, I am heartened by the extent of consensus in the Chamber. We are all united in wanting children to be safe, both in their own home with the parent who has custody of them, and with non-resident parents. We are united as well in agreeing that it is in children's interests to have ongoing contact with both their mother and their father, although there will be some exceptions where that is not in the best interests of the child.

The first aspect that I shall consider is prevention, which is not specifically dealt with in the Bill. Again, I commend my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham, who touched on trying to prevent couples from splitting up. I also commend the hon. Members for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke), who referred to that, and the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) who mentioned the important topic of marriage preparation. We miss that all the time. It is not something for which we can or should legislate, but it is a matter of political will and a matter for greater funding priority than it is currently given.

Is it possible to reduce the workload of the family courts and of CAFCASS, which we have been hearing about? I would argue that it is. There is a growing body of evidence around the world that that is the case. Let us start in America. The community marriage policies that have sprung up there have halved—yes, halved—the divorce rate in some cities. Modesto in California and Austin in Texas are two examples. The university of Texas has undertaken independent corroboration of the effect of community marriage policies across America and estimates that they have prevented some 31,000 divorces and that the divorce rate across all those community marriage policy areas is significantly lower than in areas without it.

In Australia, there is a concerted effort to tackle the problem. We heard briefly from some hon. Friends about the family relationship centres in Australia, which play a role in making sure that the arrangements are correct for children when parents have separated. They also do important preventive work beforehand to try and help couples stay together and make marriages successful. Those organisations are not run by the state but receive some support from it. Given that the Government are considering reform of the Child Support Agency, it is interesting that the Australian child support agency is involved in helping non-resident parents to be good parents and provides materials to enable them to do that. That is a good example of the way in which, cross-departmentally, across all the agencies of Government, we could do better in this country. In Singapore and Malaysia, both Governments are taking the matter seriously. Similarly, Dubai in the middle east came to my attention recently.

[Andrew Selous]

I am trying to set up a project in my constituency. Last week, we launched our own community marriage policy and, in time, I hope to develop two community family trusts. I know that the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole has an excellent one in her constituency doing very good work in schools. I am envious of that, and want the same in my constituency. I hope that all hon. Members might take more of an interest in such projects, so that we can reduce the flow of parents and children coming into the family court system and reduce the demands on CAFCASS. We have heard from almost everyone who has spoken today that CAFCASS will have great difficulty in coping with the extra demands placed upon it by the Bill.

Mr. Kidney: Does the hon. Gentleman remember that a couple of hon. Members spoke about the new children's centres that are planned for many parts of the country as being places where contact can take place? Does he agree that they could also make admirable focuses for parent support services? In my constituency, Stafford, I have an ambition to get Home Start to be the front-of-house service for supporting parents.

Andrew Selous: The hon. Gentleman is right that children's centres are good forums for support centres for parents, but I am discussing support for couples, which is a slightly different point. Support for parents is important, but almost the most important thing that parents can do for their children is to be kind to each other. If parents do that, it sets a wonderful example to their children and helps them to stay together, which benefits their children.

I am particularly interested in the point that my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham made about the contribution of social workers in Kent. Neither the voluntary sector nor social services have a monopoly in that area, but much more could be achieved through working together.

Mr. Stewart Jackson: Does my hon. Friend support the work of the charity Parent Talk? Last week, I attended an event specifically designed to help parents cope with the difficult job of parenting that that charity put on in a primary school in one of the most deprived areas in my constituency. Support includes videos and booklets to help keep together families which are sometimes in difficult financial circumstances.

Andrew Selous: I do not know that particular charity, but it sounds excellent and I happy to commend it, given what my hon. Friend has just said about its work.

When I mentioned the work of community family trusts to the Prime Minister on the Floor of the House on 7 December, he was full of praise for their work, but the projected budgets for them across the country have been released since then, and, as the hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole said, they are not good, which concerns me. When the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Garston (Maria Eagle) and I debated fatherhood in Westminster Hall, she agreed to ask her officials to examine best practice around the world. The Government could do so much more.

Annette Brooke: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will not be surprised to hear that, despite the excellence of the community family trust in Poole, plans are being made to close the office because, although some grants have been achieved from outside bodies, the funding is not sufficient to maintain the current excellent service.

Andrew Selous: I am sorry to hear that. The onus is on local community family trusts to try to raise as much money as they can. Some of the central support for the work of community family trusts has been cut and I hope that today's debate will enable Ministers to review some of those decisions. As the hon. Member for Stafford and others said, it is right that the focus should be on mediation, avoiding cases going to court in the first place and early intervention.

I, too, have examined the situation in Florida, which is also mentioned in the Department for Education and Skills publication, "Children's needs, parents' responsibilities":

> "Schemes to divert parents away from court have been developing, including the scheme led by Judge John Lendermann in Florida whereby parents are given information about the damaging impact of their conflict on their children and invited to work out a parenting plan with the help of a mediator. Other programmes are being developed to help and support parents by teaching about their new roles as collaborative mothers and fathers after separation."

We should be going in that direction in the United Kingdom, and I share the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Stafford that the Bill does not explicitly state how we can do so and whether sufficient funds are available.

Clause 4 deals with the enforcement of court orders, which remains an area of great concern to me. Over the past four and a half years, several constituents have come to me to complain about this. Typically, they are good, concerned fathers who regularly pay their child support as they should, month by month. Some of them have been back to the court 30 or 40 times to try to get their disputes resolved and to have enforced the contact that they have been granted by the court after it has weighed up all the considerations. They have come to me and said that neither the court nor the police have been interested in ensuring that the contact that they were granted is enforced.

That was graphically illustrated to me in my constituency surgery about two weeks ago, when a serving company sergeant-major came to see me. He sat down in front of me and took off the fleece that he was wearing, and right in the middle of his chest was the symbol of his office as a warrant officer in the Army—a large crown. He said, "I don't believe in the antics of Fathers 4 Justice"—who, it is worth remembering, have physically changed the shape of this Chamber since we last debated these issues. He went on, "I stand for what this country stands for. I am a serving soldier and I have done everything right. I pay all the money that I am required to. I have a court order that has stamped on it the same crown that I wear as the badge of my office, yet it is not worth the paper it is written on in terms of my ability to see my children." That is an absolutely scandalous state of affairs for a good, caring father who has every right to see his children, and whose children will be missing out on the input of a good and dedicated father. The tragedy is that the gentleman who came to see me is one of 7,000 non-resident parents every year who find that the court orders that have been granted to enable them to see their children are being breached.

My worry is that it is not sufficiently clear exactly what will happen if these contact orders continue to be breached. When I intervened on the Minister during her opening speech, she said, properly, that the matter would be left to the courts. However, as Members of Parliament, we collectively represent the High Court of Parliament. It is important that we make it absolutely clear that, where people have acted properly, the court has duly considered all the information, the non-resident father clearly has no history of domestic violence or anything similar, and the court has said that contact must happen, that contact is in the best interests of the child and we must ensure as a Parliament that it happens. That is fundamental.

If the constituent whom I spoke about, or any other such constituent, comes back to see me after the Bill has passed into law, I will feel that I have failed him if the contact that the court has said that he should have with his children, and his children with him, is not being granted. I am sure that the Minister understands the seriousness of this. We have to ensure that the law has teeth and that where contact has been ordered it really does happen.

The difficulty will centre on what series of escalating steps—my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham mentioned this—is put in place by the courts to bring that about. It is clearly sensible to have parenting intervention programmes to try to convince parents to do the right thing. I like the idea of giving compensatory time. We could also consider fines going from one parent to the other so that the child does not lose out, with perhaps some mechanism to ensure that that money is indeed spent on the child. It is a vital issue. Many non-resident parents—often fathers—give up their house and the day-to-day care of their children. In many cases, another man moves into their house and lives with their children for most of the time. If the one thing that they have been given—a right by a court to see their children—is flouted, it is a massive injustice for the children and the non-resident parents.

I echo all the points that have been made about grandparents, but why confine the comments to grandparents? Uncles, aunts, cousins and the extended family generally are vital for the development of our nation's children. Many of us have benefited from close relationships with all members of our extended family. Our view of the family is much too nuclear in this country and in several European countries. We could greatly benefit from a more southern European approach. Contact and enforcement is important not only for the non-resident parent but for all those who have loved and cared for children. For many grandparents, uncles and aunts, the children whom they will not see have been an incredibly important part of their lives. We must ensure that the matter is taken seriously for their sake, too.

I want to raise a practical point. We cannot legislate for it, so it properly does not appear in the Bill, but it concerns me and I should like to consider it. When non-resident parents travel some way from their homes to see their children, there may not be a contact centre in which to see them. Supervised visits have to take place in a contact centre, but if the visits are unsupervised and there is no contact centre, where do they go? There is an expression, "McDads". In the summer, it may not be so bad—perhaps there is a park or another place outside on a warm day—but where, physically, do we expect non-resident parents to spend any quality time with their children? I am not looking for state provision from the Minister but I am trying to think of solutions.

Perhaps charities can help. We have heard much about children's charities today. Perhaps the NSPCC or other charities that have been slightly criticised may like to consider the problem. Perhaps churches, faith groups or anyone in a community who has space in their home and a heart for such matters could help. Perhaps arrangements could be made to put non-resident parents and their children with people who would like to open their homes to them. The non-resident parents could relax and play with their children in a familiar, family environment. That would have to be done by agreement and negotiation, but it is an important matter that some of my constituents who are non-resident parents—and non-resident grandparents—who have to travel some way have raised with me. I do not look to the Government for an answer—it is properly not within their remit—so Ministers can relax. However, I hope that they at least agree that it is an important matter to consider in the context of the care of children with non-resident parents.

Other hon. Members have mentioned delay. "Justice delayed is justice denied" is a common saying about the law. That is nowhere more true than when children are involved. Childhood is finite and crucial. If a parent misses specific stages of a child's development, they are gone for ever. That is a tragedy. Speed is therefore important. Of course, we must get things right but speed is also vital and I hope that that will be taken fully into account.

5.19 pm

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): We have had a full and wide-ranging debate. We have heard that children everywhere must cope with increasingly complex and difficult family relationships. Every year, 150,000 children have to deal with the distress and upset of divorce. One in five children are likely to go through their parents' separation or divorce before they reach the age of 16. That is difficult for any child.

Indeed, parental divorce is seen by children as one of their biggest concerns and fears. We need to bear that in mind as we discuss the Bill. We have heard that great importance is put on children maintaining a relationship with both parents after separation or divorce, and that has been accepted by all speakers on both sides of the House. However, the harsh reality is that after only two short years of separation, 40 per cent. of non-resident divorced and separated parents lose contact with their children. That should set alarm bells ringing for all of us.

We have also heard arguments on both sides of the House that reinforce the fact that the Bill does not grasp the full magnitude of the social problems faced by children growing up in this country today. We must not miss the opportunity to get to the heart of the problem, because we face many challenges as we consider this very difficult and sometimes apparently intractable problem.

[Mrs. Maria Miller]

There needs to be a change in the way in which family law deals with establishing and maintaining contact between non-resident parents and their children, and a change in the way in which we ensure that the law is put into practice. We have heard today that many other countries are considering new and different ways of doing that, and it seems entirely appropriate that we should examine those options in more detail in Committee, to see whether we can learn anything from them. Those countries' legal systems are not dissimilar to our own, so I hope that that would not be a difficult challenge for us to undertake.

There is also common ground between the Government and the official Opposition on these matters. The Government's Green Paper clearly states:

"After separation, both parents should have responsibility for, and a meaningful relationship with, their children, so long as it is safe."

The document goes on to say:

"It is in the interests of the child to have a meaningful ongoing relationship with both parents".

That is important.

It should not be the role of the Government to dictate the relationship between parents and their children, but it is their role to ensure that systems are in place to provide guidance when it is needed. The Bill lacks explicit guidance on the important role that both parents can play in ensuring the well-being of their children. The Green Paper was more explicit about such provisions, but the Bill is not.

As I have said, there is common ground between the Government and the Opposition. We all agree that the child's welfare is of paramount importance, and we must ensure that any legislation designed to support children has that at its heart. We need to debate these matters as they appear to children. I am not a lawyer, and perhaps Members of Parliament should try to speak not as lawyers but as Members of Parliament. I am married to a lawyer, and I know that it is sometimes difficult for lawyers to get out of the habit of speaking as lawyers, but that is an important challenge for us.

First and foremost, we should focus on the everyday, practical problems that children face. We should then let the judiciary decide how they are dealt with, when it comes within its remit to do so. Indeed, the judiciary itself says that family law does not fit easily into the judicial system, and some of the problems that we have discussed today suggest that that perspective is correct.

We have all agreed today that parents play a pivotal role in achieving the best outcomes for children. We have also agreed that the vast majority of non-resident parents want to stay in contact with their children, and we need to keep in the forefront of our minds that, in 90 per cent. of cases, it is perfectly safe for them to do so. However, anyone reading the transcript of today's debate might find that somewhat surprising.

The Bill attempts to encourage contact and to make the sanctions that are in place workable. We cannot help feeling, however, that it merely tinkers at the edges of a more deeply rooted problem. There is a general feeling that a lack of confidence in the family court system has resulted in many parents settling for less contact, or unreasonable contact time, as legal fees and court time make it difficult or even impossible for non-resident parents to dispute cases. I have encountered many such instances in my constituency, and most Members who are present can probably think of one or two in theirs.

All too often, as others have said, even when parents have not had to resort to the courts, non-resident parents find it difficult to secure the time with their children that they need in order to maintain and develop the parent-child relationship. Difficult situations are often compounded by non-resident parents' living in accommodation that is not suitable for their children to visit, let alone stay in. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) made that point. A parent who has had to leave the family home may well be living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation, or other accommodation that is deeply unsuitable for a child to visit.

Lengthy and costly judicial process only serves to exacerbate the problem. As we heard earlier, the Government's own research shows that one in four contact and residence cases lasts more than a year, and a quarter of all cases involve multiple applications resulting from enforcement problems. The system often fuels existing tensions between parents, and a feeling of marginalisation for non-resident parents. Clearly none of that is in a child's best interests.

The law should make clear that we value the contribution of both parents to the future welfare of a child whenever that is safe—and, as I have said, it is safe in the vast majority of cases. If a child's relationship with his or her parent is to flourish and not wither on the vine, time is needed. We must examine ways in which the legal system can become more accessible, and can work better to bring about successful outcomes for children rather than fuelling conflict in already difficult and emotionally charged circumstances. That is why we will seek fundamental amendments to the Bill, including a legal presumption of co-parenting and an explicit statement of reasonable contact, backed up by early intervention and mediation.

We have heard a great many speeches today, which will give us some interesting topics to think about before the Committee stage. My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) made a powerful case for some of the changes that I have talked about. That led to a useful discussion on many issues, including co-parenting and children's safety. I am sure that we shall return to them in Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. Jackson) made a number of interventions as well as his speech. He made an important point about the invaluable role of extended families, particularly grandparents. As we all know, they have a noted role in child care. I expect that we shall hear more of that next week. I agree that it is important for us to understand grandparents' role in children's lives. We must also ensure that the legal approach, which at present can seem rather hostile to that group of people, is amended so that we can support them more. Perhaps we should take a leaf out of the book of Canada, the home country of one set of my own children's grandparents. I am sure that I shall gain some useful input from them in the next few days.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) focused on adoption, which is an important element of the Bill and should not be overshadowed by the debate on part 1. He drew extensively from his constituency experience, broadening the debate in a useful and helpful way. My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire raised the issue of preventing marriage breakdown, which I agree should be given more priority, and cited a number of examples in the United States. Divorce rates have been significantly reduced there because the importance of supporting marriage has been acknowledged. My hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham made an important point about not automatically assuming that a non-resident parent would be an inferior parent.

Labour Members raised issues that were raised by my hon. Friends. The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) talked about helping parents to be better prepared for the responsibilities of parenthood, and made a strong case for increasing mediation. Importantly, he questioned the Bill's silence on the issue of delays in court proceedings, which can be corrosive and destructive during the separation and divorce process. We should pick up on that matter in Committee.

The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) talked about a number of aspects of the Bill, including CAFCASS's capacity to meet the requirements of the Bill as regards risk assessments. Importantly, she touched on the issue of safety and the hidden aspects of domestic violence, of which we should all be aware when we discuss the Bill. It is an important issue.

The hon. Member for Luton, South (Margaret Moran), who made a considered contribution, raised the important issue of domestic violence and child care and various other aspects of the Bill, including the importance of clause 7. The hon. Member for Stockport (Ann Coffey) touched on the importance of mothers and fathers and the fact they have responsibilities, which, again, we should keep to the fore.

As my hon. Friend the Member for East Worthing and Shoreham pointed out, there is a fair amount of agreement in principle on the issue of inter-country adoption, although we have some concerns about the fashioning of the new procedures and will consider that in a little more detail in Committee. We feel strongly that it is perfectly legitimate to consider overseas adoption but we share the Government's concerns about the cases of child trafficking in recent months. However, we must be vigilant that restrictions do not lead to a growth in private adoption.

In Committee, the official Opposition will seek to challenge and to encourage the Government to face head on the scale of change needed to achieve a better result for children, who are all too often caught in the middle of their parents' separation or divorce. We will encourage the Government to be bolder in the Bill to achieve those ends. We know that the Government often have regretted not having the courage to be bolder when seeking solutions to the important problems that are faced by our country. I can reassure Ministers that we will do all we can to ensure that that is not the case in this instance.

5.33 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Maria Eagle): I agree with the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) that we have had a very interesting and constructive debate. I congratulate her on what I think is her first effort at the Dispatch Box, which was extremely accomplished.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): The first of many.

Maria Eagle: No doubt it is but that is not a matter for me to decide.

I congratulate hon. Members on both sides of the House who have participated in an extremely stimulating, wide-ranging and well-argued debate. It is apparent from their speeches that they approach the issue with a passionate commitment to try to ensure that children caught up in the divorce or separation of couples, and the bitterness that sometimes results, are not harmed too much by that experience. There is no doubt that that commitment was apparent even if it was also apparent that there may be one or two slightly different approaches to how best to achieve that. That is no different from the tone adopted when the Bill was debated in another place and during later proceedings on it. The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Annette Brooke) was right to say that proceedings on the Bill have been going on for some time. That lengthy deliberation is only correct because we need to get things right; the future of the children whom we are trying to assist depends on our doing so.

The debate did occasionally descend into slightly bad temper and we had a couple of somewhat vehement spats between the hon. Members for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) and for Mid-Dorset and North Poole. There was also a spat involving the hon. Gentleman and the NSPCC, which was of course unable to defend itself. However, it will doubtless find an opportunity to do so when the debate is over.

I want to sort out what I believe to have been a genuine misunderstanding—it does not happen very often—between the usual channels. The hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham suggested that the Government are trying to avoid giving the Opposition the time that they want for consideration in Committee, but I assure him that that is not the case. There has been a genuine misunderstanding, in that the usual channels on our side gave what was asked for, but I assure him that the Government intend to be flexible and to provide more time in Committee if required.

I shall deal with some of the points and broad themes that were raised, although I will not have time to deal with them all, given that most Members spoke at great length. It is clear that contact with both parents is in the interests of the child if it can be done in safety; indeed, there is general agreement in all parts of the House on that point. I would argue—as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) argued, perhaps more eloquently than I ever could—that case law already suggests that the courts start from the position that contact between a child and their parents is generally in the child's best interests.

The different perspectives expressed on the Floor of the House disagreed on the question whether such contact compromises the safety of the child in some instances, or the paramount interest of the child's welfare, given that such contact often breaks down. The Children Act 1989 does of course contain the paramountcy principle, and the Government and I believe it incredibly important that that principle, which was established with the support of Members in all parts of the House, be retained. We heard from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar an excellent exposition on what changing the presumptions would mean in legal terms. It is undoubtedly true that many fathers are unable to spend the time with their children that they would like to spend, and it is right that we offer them support and encourage a positive relationship between children and both parents after separation. The Bill attempts to ensure that we do just that by providing the courts with more flexibility in enforcing contacts that they have ordered, on the basis that they are in the interest of the child. That is what the Bill is about.

However, we need to be clear that any presumption—even if couched as a principle in the absence of evidence to the contrary—represents a different legal model from the one enshrined in the 1989 Act. To place something else on a level with that which is supposed to constitute paramountcy is incompatible with the paramountcy principle. I am certain that we will continue to have legalistic and non-legalistic arguments on this issue—from lawyers and non-lawyers—as the Bill proceeds through the House, but the Government do not want to do anything to compromise the paramountcy principle.

In the main, Members in all parts of the House had something positive to say about mediation. The issue was raised of whether voluntary mediation is best, or whether mediation could—or even should—be compulsory. It is clear that voluntary mediation is best: one can lead a horse to water, but one cannot make it drink. Can we really expect people to be forced to mediate if they are not in the mood? Requiring mediation before a case can proceed, for example, could simply result in further unnecessary delay if the parties are already well-entrenched in their respective positions and are in no fit state to see that mediation might actually help. However, the Joint Committee considering the draft Bill recommended that the court should be able to direct people to attend an initial meeting with a mediator, and I think that that would be appropriate.

The hon. Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole asked whether information about mediation was available other than in the form of leaflets. She asked whether a video was available, and I can tell her that the Government are even more modern than that, having produced a DVD on the subject. We are moving into the modern world, and the courts will have to do the same.

The hon. Member for Basingstoke said that some 40 per cent. of non-resident parents lose contact with their children within two years of separation. I have heard that figure before, but I am not sure of its provenance. I hope that the hon. Lady will be able to let me know, perhaps during the Committee stage. However, the omnibus survey by the Office for National Statistics suggests that about three quarters of non-resident parents who have been separated for between two and three years have contact with their children at least once a week, and that fewer than 10 per cent. of them have no contact at all. In respect of longer separations, the survey suggests that about 20 per cent. of children have no contact with a non-resident parent after two years. That is still far too many, but it is fewer than the hon. Lady suggested, and we might have to return to the matter in Committee.

I am glad that hon. Members on all sides of the House mentioned the positive role played by grandparents and other members of the extended family. I agree completely with that, and note that the Bill can apply not only to resident or non-resident parents but to grandparents as well. It is not restricted to parents, so I hope that it will assist in all of these matters.

The question of resources for CAFCASS and the courts was raised. I can understand that, but the Government have always made it clear that they should have adequate funding so that they can fulfil their responsibilities under part 1 of the Bill. My right hon. Friend the former Minister for Children, who is now Minister for Employment and Welfare Reform, said as much in evidence to the Joint Committee. She stressed that the Bill's provisions will be implemented only when we are satisfied that appropriate resources are available.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) and the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) both spoke about how the work loads of the family courts and of CAFCASS could be reduced. We have high hopes that the Bill will enable us to shift resources from too much report writing to more proactive and helpful interventions. I know that CAFCASS is very committed to ensuring that that happens.

The hon. Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) was extremely ingenious in managing to talk about public law and domestic adoption in connection with a Bill that deals with private law and inter-country adoption. I congratulate him on that, and I am, of course, aware of the case that he raised. I would take an extremely dim view if any local authority sought to remove children from parents simply because they were learning disabled. Some of the legislation for which I had the honour to be responsible in the previous Parliament will come into force in December, and make it even more difficult for public authorities to behave in that way than is currently the case. There is an increased awareness of these matters, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will continue the campaigns on behalf of his constituents for which he is known.

In conclusion, it is clear that we will have a lot more to say in Committee. We might even have a little more time in which to say it, given the accidental error in the programme motion that meant that only four sittings were originally provided for. I look forward to that discussion, as I believe that hon. Members of all parties have a genuine interest in making things better for the children of divorcing and separating couples.

That is certainly true of the Government. If every child in this country is to matter, we must make sure that those whose families separate do not suffer the consequences—that is, lack of development and self-esteem, and an inability to do their very best in future life. We are all in favour of that, and I commend the Bill to the House.

PETITION

Vodafone Site (Felpham)

5.45 pm

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): I have pleasure in presenting a petition signed by more than 400 residents of Middleton and Felpham in my constituency. It expresses opposition to the proposal to install a 14 m high telephone mast in the middle of the village. The planning authority, Arundel district council, refused planning permission, following which Vodafone appealed to the Deputy Prime Minister. I am grateful to Mandy Brown and all those who have worked to collect the signatures and who have organised protests against the mast.

The petition reads:

"The Petition of residents of Middleton, Felpham, Bognor Regis and others,

Declares that there is a proposal for a Vodafone base station site at the Southern Water compound, Middleton Road, Felpham, Bognor Regis, West Sussex. The petitioners strongly object to the positioning of a Vodafone mast close to Bishop Tufnell Schools, the Health Centre and at the heart of a residential area.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Deputy Prime Minister to reject the proposal.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Child Psychiatry Services

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.— [Mr. Heppell.]

5.47 pm

Mr. Edward Vaizey (Wantage) (Con): I am extremely grateful for the opportunity this evening to debate the important subject of child psychiatry, indeed, to continue the theme of this afternoon and talk about services for children. I begin by making a few general remarks about mental health in this country. It is a matter of common agreement that mental health services are often seen as the Cinderella of the health service. It always seems to me that mental health services are last in the queue for funding and first in line for cuts. It is particularly difficult because in recent years we have grown to understand more and more about mental health issues and problems. In this country, for example, it is now known that up to 10 per cent. of young people between the ages of five and 16 experience significant mental health problems such as depression, self-harm, obsessional disorder, anorexia or anxiety. What is less well known perhaps is that 40 per cent. of those children have no contact at all with any kind of mental health service.

In fact in The Independent today an article on this very subject highlights the problem. It points out that children with mental health problems are being put at severe risk by long waiting lists to see a psychiatrist. It claims that there is now an average wait of six months and increasing reliance on inappropriate drug treatment. Adrian Worrall, of the Royal College of Psychiatrists, is quoted as saying:

"All too often, children are not being picked up, are not receiving fast access to treatment or appropriate treatment when they do get it. This will have long-term consequences for everyone."

The article quotes a survey of 1,300 GPs by the medical magazine Pulse which found that the average wait for a child psychiatrist appointment was 188 days. Children have to wait 79 days before an initial assessment is made by the child and adolescent mental health service, and a further 102 days before they receive treatment. Some 93 per cent of family doctors—in effect, almost all GPs—admit that they prescribe antidepressants to children because of a lack of alternative therapies, despite safety concerns surrounding the use of drug treatments.

The article concluded with a quote from the editor of Pulse, Phil Johnson. He says:

"It is a scandal that some of the most vulnerable patients in the country are left languishing on waiting lists because apparently mental health is not seen as a priority."

That sets the general scene of mental health services for children and young people, but I want to concentrate this evening on a specific aspect of that care—that is, care for children, and even more specifically, in-patient care for these children. I should stress that I am talking about children, not adolescents, for whom care can often be very different. Many of the children about whom I will talk have specialist and complex needs. Some have neuro-psychiatric disorders that do not respond to out-patient treatment and most of them come from families that need a huge amount of support. Apart from the simple humanitarian need to give those children the best possible care at the earliest possible stage, it is clear that children left untreated continue to have a poor quality of life into adolescence and adulthood and sometimes cause wider problems in society.

In-patient treatment for children can have a spectacularly beneficial effect. The children and young persons in-patient evaluation study, commissioned by the Department of Health and published in 2004, showed that substantial improvements could be achieved in the mental health of children admitted to in-patient child psychiatry services. The study made it clear that the subsequent needs of children who had benefited from in-patient treatment were reduced, to the extent that they could usually be treated in a child and adolescent mental health—CAMHS—community tier 3 service. Further, the improvements in those children were sustained one year after in-patient admission, often with very little further community service provision. So there is little doubt that in-patient services are vital for the small numbers of children who require complex treatment. I have been told by practitioners, especially in child law, that they have seen remarkable results from such in-patient units, including swift turnarounds and remarkable outcomes.

Despite that evidence, the availability of in-patient child psychiatric services seems suddenly to be in precipitate decline. In 2001, the national in-patient child and adolescent psychiatry study showed that in 1999 there were 103 beds in 12 children's units and 46 beds in five general CAMHS units. In 2003, there had been a slight increase to 110 beds. But since then, four children's in-patient services have closed. Shirle Hill in Sheffield no longer provides in-patient care. Stepping Stones in Sutton, Surrey, has closed completely. Larchwood in Haywards Heath now has only two beds as part of an adolescent ward, and an outreach service. Red Oak in Lancaster has closed with a loss of 12 beds, but it may reopen in 2007 although only as an adolescent unit for 12 to 17-year-olds. A bed recount is underway and it is likely to show a reduction in beds to levels substantially below the 1999 figure.

Those closures are bad enough, but three more in-patient services are under imminent—I stress the word imminent—threat of closure, including the Park hospital in Oxford; the ward in Birmingham children's hospital; and the West End children's unit in Hull, which currently runs only a skeleton service anyway. If those services close, it will mean a dramatic reduction of about a third in the number of units specialising in that work for children and their families.

This evening, I want to concentrate on one unit in particular which serves my constituents in Oxfordshire and acts a case study of what is happening across the country. The Park hospital in Oxford has provided in-patient care for children for some 50 years. It provides a general service with a strong neuro-psychiatric leaning and highly valued national epilepsy services, based on skills that have been built up over many years. Child psychiatry is a highly specialised area of clinical practice. The closure of the Park is not simply the closure of a hospital—although that would be bad enough—but also risks severely damaging, and probably losing altogether, one of Britain's leading centres for training, research and treatment of child psychiatric disorders.

What makes the threat of closure even harder to understand is that the child psychiatry service in Oxford and nationally is set to be enhanced by the provision of a specialist scanner, at a cost of some £2.7 million, at the Warneford Hospital in Headington. Its major clinical use will be the investigation of complex epilepsy and the pre-surgical investigation of patients with intractable seizures. Together with the new in-patient facilities that have been promised for so many years, it would have provided the country with an important world-class resource for the management of children with complex interactions between behaviour and epilepsy.

As I said, in-patient child psychiatry is not a service that can be seen merely as an add-on; it cannot suddenly be set up at short notice. It takes years and years to build up the highly specialised expertise that exists at the Park, which must be preserved at all costs. For example, higher specialist training in child psychiatry requires at least six months' full-time experience working in a children's in-patient service, often with a year's follow-up specialist training. There are already unfilled consultant posts across the UK, so the closure of the Park would further reduce training for doctors and other mental health professionals. The possible closure of the Park, which is being carried with little consultation—as anyone in the House would understand it—highlights general concerns about the resourcing of child psychiatric services nationwide.

First, it is clear to me that the reason behind the potential closure is undoubtedly financial, although it is being dressed up as a clinical decision. The local mental health trust says that it is inappropriate these days to admit children to hospital, although there is no clinical evidence for that claim. Indeed, I have already mentioned a study that shows that that is not the case. Of course, specialist clinicians will do all they can to avoid admitting children to hospital but in some cases it is unavoidable and is clearly beneficial.

Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): I am sure that my hon. Friend shares the concern of many of us that if the Park closed, there would be no children's in-patient service in a triangle bounded by London, Manchester and Dublin. The consequence would be that children admitted to hospital would have to travel huge distances, which would have a clinical impact on their treatment.

Mr. Vaizey: I absolutely share my hon. Friend's concern. It is incredibly important that families can visit their very young children when they are in unfamiliar surroundings. The more units that close—especially if we lose the Park—the longer the distances that families will have to travel and the more time that they will have to spend apart, which will have a further devastating impact.

It is said that low bed occupancy at the Park illustrates the point that fewer children are being admitted to hospital as part of clinical practice. However, I submit that low occupancy rates are a symptom not of a clinical decision but of contractual complexity. It is well known that many specialist services across the country would like to make use of the Park and Oxford's facilities, but—as I understand it—the trust has not pursued those case-by-case contracts.

The dilemma faced by the Park is a clear example of how local commissioning falls down. The Park is a national as well as a local service, yet it is suffering the severe side-effects of the local financial crisis that affects Oxfordshire's health services across the board. For example, Oxfordshire's supporting people budget, which helps adults with learning difficulties lead independent lives, has been severely cut. The mental health trust faces cuts of £1 million this year and a further £5 million over the next five years. Nursing and psychiatric posts are being cut. The Barnes unit at the John Radcliffe hospital, which provides psychiatric services to those admitted to the accident and emergency department after a suicide attempt or self-harm, is also under threat of closure. Day services are being closed, including the Ridgeway day centre at Didcot in my constituency. Local financial pressures are leading to the potential closure of a national specialist service.

I have been in correspondence with the Department of Health about mental health and local health issues since July last year—they were some of the first issues that crossed my desk after I was elected—and I have been greeted throughout by the Department's mantra:

"It is for PCTs, with the support of the Strategic Health Authority if required, to plan and develop services in line with national priorities and in context of local need within the financial resources available to them".

With the best will in the world—

It being Six o'clock the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

Mr. Vaizey: What was just said was not meaningless verbiage—it was a very important procedural point of the House—but to return to the meaningless verbiage to which I was referring from the Department of Health, it is effectively passing the buck. Partly because I am currently a member of the armed forces parliamentary scheme and have recently been attached to the Royal Marines, the analogy occurred to me that allowing a local mental health trust to decide the fate of the Park would be a bit like asking Devon county council to decide the fate the Royal Marines.

Although I believe in local commissioning and local accountability, at some point the Government must recognise where they have a national resource that must have national backing. For example, a local primary care trust will admit a child to an in-patient unit less than once a year on average. So why on earth would a local mental health trust be charged solely with the responsibility for the Park? When the local mental health trust writes that the trust "is not able to continue to host tier 4 in-patient services for children under 11 as the future withdrawal of local contracts leaves us without any secure income", it is saying that it has been left holding the baby. Given that situation, it is further saying that it is going to sell the cot—the land on which the hospital stands.

Since it became more widely known that I would hold this Adjournment debate, things have moved somewhat. I was told this week by the mental health trust that "for the foreseeable future, services will remain at the Park and we are in discussion with the PCTs about how the services will look in future and where in-patient facilities will be available".

[Mr. Vaizey]

Again, I am not at all sure what that means. Certainly, the people whom I have been speaking to do not believe that the Park has been saved from closure. Certainly, the mental health community believes that the Park will close. Has there been a failure of communication or a failure of consultation? How long is the foreseeable future? Where will in-patient services be available? Until the recent crisis, the intention had always been to close the Park, but to reopen a new in-patient facility.

The Government seem to be refusing to take responsibility for a national service. That is why I have chosen to raise this subject at a national level, in the House this evening. Managers, removed from the clinical chalk face, push through changes—or perhaps they are forced to push them through—that the professionals counsel against, whether in respect of special needs education or specialist clinical services, such as child psychiatry.

This, though, is not, and should not be, a matter for party politics. It is genuinely an issue of national concern, and if we do not act, it will be a matter of national shame. The Park, and other units, shine as beacons of national excellence throughout the world. Moreover, they shine as beacons of hope for many vulnerable and disadvantaged children and their families. With little notice and even less justification, those beacons are being snuffed out one by one.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton and Honiton (Angela Browning) reminded the House, that will mean longer journey times for children and their families; more time spent apart; the inappropriate use of adolescent and even adult services for children; a greater cost to the community, because of the need to provide longer-term treatment; and the loss of a specialist service built up over many years.

As a House, we cannot sit idly by and let that happen. I am sure that the Minister, who has listened very carefully to what I have said this evening, will not let it happen. I know that, tonight, the Minister will say that the Park must be saved and that we must retain and enhance the national specialist child psychiatry services that we still have—just—in this country.

6.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Liam Byrne): I congratulate the hon. Member for Wantage (Mr. Vaizey) on securing the debate. We have not had a chance to debate with each other before, but, through various channels, his reputation preceded him and this evening he has shown that that reputation is richly deserved.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of local points in the context of a broader national debate. This is a rare opportunity to debate child and adolescent mental health services, so I hope that the House will permit me to widen my remarks to the national picture before addressing the important local points. He singled out child psychiatric services, but we cannot consider that issue on its own; we must consider child and adolescent mental health services across the board. I pay tribute to the outstanding hard work of all staff who work in that area in the NHS and in other related services up and down the country. They provide important services, often under difficult conditions, to our children and young people.

The hon. Gentleman helpfully started with some facts and figures to set the context for the debate. He is right that last year the Office for National Statistics reported on the prevalence of mental disorders among five to 16-year-olds and found that one in 10 children had a clinically diagnosed mental disorder, 4 per cent. had an emotional disorder such as anxiety or depression, and 6 per cent. had a conduct disorder such as oppositional defiant disorder or hyperactivity. The prevalence in 2004 remained broadly unchanged from that found by the previous survey that was conducted in 1999.

To address those needs, we need to make sure that we improve the life outcomes of children with mental health problems by ensuring that all patients who need it have access to a comprehensive child and adolescent mental health service, and not just to child psychiatric services. We attach enormous importance to this matter and the hon. Gentleman was not correct to say that we do not regard it as a priority. The Government have set themselves a public service agreement target with the Treasury for the Department of Health. The way in which we achieve that vision is extremely important and our way of doing so was set out in the children's national service framework, which was published in September 2004. Quite rightly, it was recognised around the world as a leading example of how such services can be specified for children. Full implementation of the principles set out in the national service framework will not happen overnight, which is why it was given a 10-year timetable.

Quite rightly, there has been, and continues to be, significant additional investment to ensure that the important targets attached to our CAMHS work can be delivered. In the three years up to and including the current financial year, £300 million has been made available to the NHS and local authorities. Dedicated teams of CAMHS workers are advising commissioners up and down the country to help them to understand the best local strategies for improving services. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that aspects of those services have national significance and it is important that we recognise that.

All that activity is beginning to have an effect. We track our progress on CAMHS work through an annual mapping exercise. The latest results that we have relate to late 2004 and show encouraging signs of progress. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there is an enormous amount still to do, but, between 2002 and 2004, the number of CAMHS staff—both professional and non-professional—increased by 20 per cent. The number of cases dealt with increased by 30 per cent. One of the biggest worries is the length of the wait before seeing a specialist, but, here too, the CAMHS mapping work shows that there is cause for optimism. In 2002, only 24 per cent. of new cases were seen in four weeks; by 2004, that figure had risen to 50 per cent. As the hon. Gentleman says, there is an enormous amount still to do, but the direction of travel is encouraging. Similarly, the number of cases waiting for more than 13 weeks has reduced from a little more than 50 per cent. and is now down to just over 30 per cent. Again, there is an enormous amount to do but there are some encouraging signs of progress.

The debate is about the future rather than the past. There are important elements that we need to get right if we are to make serious progress on this agenda, and I want to highlight them. The first is our ability in every part of the country to provide access to 24-hour services to meet urgent needs. I am pleased to say that emergency coverage of this sort is now available in 80 per cent. of primary care trusts. It has increased from about 57 per cent. in 2003.

The second area is the provision of CAMH services to people who have a learning disability. It has been of some interest to many right hon. and hon. Members. The availability of this type of service has increased from about a third in 2003 to more than 50 per cent. of PCTs now. The third area is the provision of CAMH services to 16 and 17-year-olds. I know that the hon. Gentleman centred the debate not on adolescents but on children, but that is an important area because as young people reach maturity and independence at different ages, CAMH services should be structured to take account of that.

Young people may wish to decide whether their care is managed within CAMHS or within adult mental health services. We think that it is important that CAMHS should be available for young people up to and including the age of 17. In 2003, half of local services were able so to deliver. The figure has now increased to three quarters. There are signs of progress although there are a number of important hurdles that we still need to leap over, as it were.

The first issue is that of staffing. It is an important part of the set of challenges that the hon. Gentleman has outlined. There is some good news to report in that the number of consultant child psychiatrists working in hospitals has increased from about 390 in 1997 by nearly 25 per cent. to nearly 500 in 2004. That is the last year for which figures are available. The rate of progress on staffing appears to be accelerating not only in the case of child psychiatrists but in other staff sectors as well. For example, in England the total number of staff employed in CAMHS teams in 2004 was nearly 9,000. That is up by 15 per cent. compared with the previous year. That is quite a rate of growth in the space of a year, given how long many of these professionals need to spend in training.

Over the same year, the number of clinical child psychologists increased from nearly 1,000 by nearly a third to 1,320. Over the same period, the number of CAMHS nurses increased from 2,000 to nearly 2,500. That is quite a rate of growth in such a short period.

The second big hurdle that we need to confront lies with the criminal justice system. We are tackling the mental health provision that is available to young people in contact with the CJS. That is a considerable issue for children in the CJS. Services that are now available include mental health screening for young people in court. There are joint appointments between CAMHS and youth offending teams—dedicated teams—that are providing in-reach to secure units and young offender institutions.

Our basic principle on this aspect of CAMHS is that a child or young person who is in contact with the CJS, whether they are in custody or in the community, should have the same sort of access to the comprehensive service as any other child or young person within the general population.

The third issue is that of adult psychiatric wards, a subject that has been of some interest to right hon. and hon. Members. The national service framework recognised that, for the majority of 16 and 17-year-olds for whom admission becomes necessary, admission to a young people's unit is the appropriate and preferred option. For some young people who are living away from the family home, or those with certain types of clinical need, an adult facility may be more appropriate. Our plans to increase CAMHS provision will reduce the incidence of placing children and young people inappropriately. As a contingency measure, NHS trusts should identify wards or settings in adult units that would be appropriate.

The issues raised by the hon. Gentleman related to his local facility of the Park hospital. I know that there have been provisional plans to close in-patient facilities there. I am advised by officials that the Park building has been deemed inappropriate for in-patient over-night care of young children. There has always been, and continues to be, an intention to develop new facilities to provide appropriate modern community and extended day services for children with a mental health problem to help the hon. Gentleman's local health community to achieve the ambitions set out in the national service framework. It is worth underlining the fact that that framework is not optional for the national health service—it is mandatory. It is spread over an extended time horizon, because of the scale of the ambition that it expresses. I understand that, because of concerns that have been voiced locally, not least by the hon. Gentleman, the plans are being further considered. I do not have a precise update on those considerations but, once I do, I would be more than happy to write to him with full information.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): A fundamental point made by the hon. Gentleman was that we cannot expect a national facility such as the one that he described to be funded purely or mostly by local commissioning. Does the Minister agree with that basic point?

Mr. Byrne: In many services, it is inappropriate for local facilities to be funded exclusively by local sources. That is right, but that is why there are national arrangements for some forms of specialised commissioning. My noble Friend Lord Warner is overseeing a review of specialised commissioning, and the Department of Health makes substantial provision in central budgets for moneys that have been identified to support specialised commissioning where appropriate.

Mr. Vaizey: The Minister said that the plans were designed to create modern community child psychiatric facilities. Everyone agrees that the building at the Park is inadequate, but it was always understood that it would be replaced. The phrase, "modern community facilities", does not include the word, "in-patient". Can the Minister be more specific, and say whether the facility will be replaced with in-patient services?

Mr. Byrne: I regret that I do not have the precise details of the plans that are being developed for the Park hospital. I understand that they are under further consideration so, as soon as I have information on the latest consideration, I am happy to write to the hon. Gentleman.

[Mr. Byrne]

In conclusion, I would like to advertise something that is very important to CAMHS—the annual positive practice awards. I was pleased to attend this year's awards in November, and they highlight some of the ways in which CAMHS teams across the country are delivering new and better services. The number and range of entries showed the enormous diversity of initiatives, and I pay tribute to the hard work and vision of all the staff who developed and delivered those service improvements. In my correspondence with the hon. Gentleman, I will include information about recipients of this year's awards. If, as I hope, he takes a long and continued interest in the years ahead in child psychiatric services and CAMHS more generally, many of those awards will be of great interest to him.

Orders of the Day

Emergency Workers (Protection) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

9.45 am

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I do not know what the statistical odds are, but this is the first time in more than 41 years that I have drawn one of the first seven slots in the ballot for private Members' Bills. Although I got such a Bill through in the past, it was on the back-of-the-Chair principle whereby all I had to say was, "Today". That was how persuasive my arguments had to be.

I hope that we can all agree at least about the Bill's objectives; it is up to individuals to decide whether they agree about the details. There is unanimity that emergency workers attending emergencies should be neither impeded nor assaulted. If that happens, the victims of the emergency that they are attending will be put at risk. An assault on an emergency officer is therefore a double assault. Often, the emergency services operate in a team of police, ambulance and fire brigade. Anything that impedes part of the team impedes the whole team.

The scale of the problem is difficult to establish because there are no national statistics. For example, Manchester fire service estimated that 200 attacks or attempts to impede its workers occurred in a year, yet Government figures suggest only nine incidents in nine months in the same year. There are no reliable statistics. That is worrying and should be remedied. If one does not know the magnitude of a problem, one cannot know what priority to give it.

It is alarming that the mindless arrogance and vandalism behind the attacks is spread throughout the country. Numerous brigades report attempts to cut off water supplies, cutting hoses and stoning ambulances, fire engines and, indeed, firemen. Scaffold poles have been driven through windscreens, risking impaling the drivers. Even more warped is the fact that many fires are deliberately started to lure the services into ambushes. I could not believe some of the things that I was told when I started looking into the matter. What grotesque, bent mind would think of putting razor blades under a banister to catch firemen hauling heavy equipment up the stairs?

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): I am sorry for interrupting the right hon. Gentleman so early but I hope that he will reassure those of us who are worried that the Bill risks gilding a lily. Why is existing law unable to cover the dreadful events that he is describing? Why does he believe that the Bill is essential? I am more than happy to support it if I am persuaded that existing law cannot cover the events. However, I would be unhappy if we introduced a new Act simply because we were not prepared or able to implement existing Acts.

Mr. Williams: One of our greatest missions in life is to make the right hon. Gentleman happy. I think he will leave the Chamber slightly, if not entirely, reassured.

[Mr. Williams]

I gave the example of razor blades and a banister. Further examples include a live electricity cable fixed to the inside of a door handle so that the firemen have no warning of what awaits them, and, even more grotesque, holes in floors covered with mats or other material, so that as the firemen go into a first or second storey room, they are unaware that they are about to step into a hole. In the past year, a fireman was shot in Borehamwood, and there was the tragic case in Scotland of a young baby who was killed by someone firing at the fire brigade attending an incident. It is thought that one bullet missed the firemen and killed the poor young child.

I shall quote from a letter from Des Prichard, the chief fire officer of East Sussex. Writing on behalf of all the fire chiefs throughout England, Wales and Northern Ireland, he states:

"Attacks do not impact only on firefighters, they ultimately impact on communities. If equipment or vehicles are damaged, they are unavailable for duty."

But the more important point is this:

"If, in certain areas, attacks occur regularly, crews have to wait until escorts are available to accompany them"— so they are delayed waiting for the police, who otherwise would not need to be there, to take them to the incident. He continues:

"Ultimately, if we are prevented from carrying out our jobs because of attacks, there is no doubt that our operational response will be affected and we may have to reconsider the types of incidents we attend."

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on coming so high in the ballot and introducing such a worthwhile Bill. He mentioned the tragic incident that happened in Scotland. The young lad's name was Andrew Morton. Is my right hon. Friend aware that legislation of the type that he proposes already exists in Scotland and is regarded as successful?

Mr. Williams: Being a non-lawyer and being instinctively lazy, having discovered that there was a working and workable Act in Scotland, I asked for the help of the Clerks of the House to transpose the Scottish Act—

Mr. Forth: Good for you!

Mr. Williams: Rest assured—the Scottish experience has been very much taken into account.

The chief fire officer suggests that across the country the fire brigade may have to reconsider the types of incident it attends. He continues:

"To have to take this action would be tragic and also affect community safety."

I am sure we all agree with that and are alarmed by the prospect. The question is how we deal with it.

I was trying to transpose a Scottish Act to existing legislation in England and Wales. I have agreed that, in Committee, I will propose separating the impeding offence from the offence of assault, and the Government have agreed that they will support an offence of "impeding an emergency worker responding to an emergency".

That is welcomed by the fire services and especially by the ambulance service—I spoke to its representatives yesterday—because at present it has no such protection at all. There will be a penalty of £1,000, which the Minister, with whom I have been liaising throughout, assures me is the same amount that a similar level of offence would incur in relation to action against the police.

The Bill will be backed by a series of other measures. There will be a package of measures particularly geared to dealing with the problem of juvenile offenders, many of whom are very young. Some are young yobs, and some, although they are not too young to be called yobs, are even below the age of 10.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): My right hon. Friend mentioned the impeding offence. Is that not the assurance that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) was seeking? Whereas there is a law of assault that could apply in any case, the police have protection against assault and obstruction in the course of their duty. The loophole in our law is that there is no offence of obstructing the ambulance or fire service on the way to deal with an emergency. Is that not a loophole that the Bill plugs?

Mr. Williams: Yes, and an important one. The emergency services welcome the Bill as an important addition to their protection. Fines do not deal effectively deal with juveniles because they either cannot pay them or do not pay them, or both. That is where the package of support measures will help. That can come only from Government and will be set out by my hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough) (LD): I am interested, too, in the point made by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). Section 21 of the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 makes clear provision to achieve the same aim, provided the Government introduce a statutory instrument to include offences in secondary legislation. Has the right hon. Gentleman explored that and the provisions of the Police Act 1996 with the Government?

Mr. Williams: The Bill gives us an immediate vehicle to achieve the desired result, so that ceases to be necessary.

The Bill, as I said, will be backed by measures to be announced by the Government. It has been welcomed by Barry Dixon of Manchester on behalf of chief fire officers.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): May I bring to my right hon. Friend's attention an incident that occurred in the west midlands? A young boy impaled himself on his bicycle. Other young people stood around and, to use that perverse phrase, indulged in happy slapping—that is, taking photographs on their mobile phones of his pain and discomfiture. The emergency services arrived and the young people surrounding the lad obstructed them and prevented them from giving the young lad the attention he desperately needed. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that the Bill and the supporting measures from the Government will address such incidents?

Mr. Williams: The aim is to address such incidents when they happen, and, more importantly, to stop them happening in the first place. That is much more difficult and requires a major educative programme, which I would ask the Government to introduce. I hope the Minister will give some reassurances on that.

Where the Government and I differed—here I shall delight the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who finds himself in an unusual alliance—was on the issue of assault. I accept that there is legislation that should and would provide for the same penalties as the Bill envisages. The problem is that it is used either rarely or not at all. The other emergency services see that the police have separate legislation embodying the same sentences and that cases involving the police are taken through to successful prosecution and sentencing, whereas the fire brigades and ambulance services have difficulty with such cases. That is why we are asking for a separate Act.

This is where I shall destroy the weekend of the right hon. Gentleman. The Government and I had discussions, and they made it clear that there is a sticking point for them, so enamoured are they of the argument made by the right hon. Gentleman. There is a sticking point to the extent that I could have lost the whole Bill—

Mr. Forth: Oh!

Mr. Williams: The right hon. Gentleman says "Oh!", but he said he supports the Bill. The choice I had to make, which also had to be made by fire brigades officers, the Fire Brigades Union and the ambulance workers, was over whether they wanted to lose their new defence of taking action against impeding in order to go down fighting for legislation that would almost certainly be lost due to means that we all well understand in this place—being talked out either today or, most certainly, on Report, which is the death ground of so many private Members' Bills.

Instead—not with enthusiasm, but in the hope that the good will is genuine in respect of what has been offered in return—I have agreed that in Committee we shall remove the repetitious element dealing with assault. I want my Bill to go through, so I am willing to rely on the written guarantees I have received, which the Minister has undertaken to reiterate today. She has particularly assured me that she will try to ensure that there are measures to achieve more prosecutions under existing law—it seems to be the will and machinery that are lacking—and that the Government will try to improve the sentencing guidelines. In that respect, they envisage assault on an emergency worker being treated as an aggravated offence. It would therefore involve a higher sentence.

Mr. Forth: I thought I heard the right hon. Gentleman say that the Minister has given him an undertaking that measures will be taken to ensure that there are more prosecutions. I would be interested if he explained that further, because I had always understood that a great alibi of this Government, and indeed of the previous one, was that prosecutions were entirely a matter for the Crown Prosecution Service, so how would the Government deliver on that undertaking?

Mr. Williams: With respect, the right hon. Gentleman has anticipated what I was about to say. I wonder how impartiality could be retained in that context, but Ministers indicated that that is what they are willing to try to do. I do not understand how the Home Office works—very few people do—and I look forward to an exposition from the Minister.

Mr. McGovern: My right hon. Friend mentioned protection for emergency workers. I am intrigued by whether community support officers are included in the Bill's definition of a constable. If they are not, would they be excluded from that protection?

Mr. Williams: I honestly do not know the answer, although I shall try to establish it. My hon. Friend the Minister, who is more of an expert in those legal matters, might deal with that on behalf of the Government.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I wonder whether the Government pointed out in their discussions with the right hon. Gentleman the fact that, by taking action in the health service, they have been able to increase the number of prosecutions by ensuring that instances are pursued, properly reported to the police and looked into, rather than disregarded, as can sometimes happen in Government services.

Mr. Williams: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. The advantage of dialogue between Ministers and Back Benchers was shown on this occasion, because I was able to enlighten the Minister on the activities of NHS security management and the seventeenfold increase in the number of prosecutions it has brought. That shows the value of a catalyst, as well as the inadequacies of the CPS, which are equally worrying. One is bound to wonder how someone other than the CPS can show a will to enforce legislation, over which the CPS sometimes seems dilatory.

In relation to the points made by the Minister about sentencing guidelines—we all know how those work—my doubt, which I put to her, is this: if she can do this now that I have introduced my Bill, why on earth has she not done it already? Months ago, in the House of Lords, Baroness Scotland was making the same argument—we can get the Sentencing Guidelines Council to alter its guidelines to the courts—yet, as far as I can establish, up to the time of my consultations with the Minister there had been no progress in that respect.

It is not my intention to labour the issue; the case is made. I have said that I would substantially amend the Bill in the House of Lords—gosh, that would be an achievement. I am due to retire at the end of this Parliament, but I assure the House that no one has made any offers to me at this stage. At the moment, I should confine myself to a Committee Room Upstairs, inadequate as it may be.

May I make it clear to the Minister that, while I accept her assurances, which I genuinely believe were made in good faith—I have a high regard and respect for her—she has to realise that the Members of Parliament sitting here, our colleagues who are unable to be present, the emergency services and the press will monitor performance against the commitments given today? Now it is up to the Government.

10.8 am

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): I commend the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) on his good intentions in introducing the Bill, and I am sure there is consensus across the House that attacks on emergency services workers are disgraceful and abhorrent. However, my concern is that the existing law should be able to protect emergency workers from attacks of all sorts made during the execution of their duty. That will be the thrust of my brief comments.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned genuine emergencies in which emergency services—whether the police, ambulance crews or fire service personnel—deal with victims, such as members of the public whom they are attempting to help. However, there are additional victims when the emergency services come under attack. Such attacks impede them as they attempt to provide assistance to the victims of a road accident, a fire or whatever it happens to be, thereby exacerbating the effect of those attacks.

Matt Wrack, general secretary of the Fire Brigades Union, has warned about the increase, in communities across the country, in what he describes as "recreational attacks" carried out by young people for their amusement. He says:

"Many attacks are in deprived areas with poor youth facilities and poor housing".

There might well be poor youth facilities and housing in those areas, but that is not an excuse. I would like to see parents brought to book to answer for the bad behaviour of their unsupervised children. If those young people are below the age of criminal responsibility, the parent should be held responsible. Parents should know where their children are and what they are doing while they are outside the home. If children cannot be trusted to behave in an acceptable way, parents should entertain them in their homes, and teach them the difference between right and wrong.

Fire service personnel in particular are victims of hurled insults and spitting, a particularly nasty habit. Such actions do not cause permanent injury but are exceedingly demoralising, and such seriously antisocial behaviour affects the way in which fire crews are able to go about their duties. I would like legislation to cover that, if it is not covered already.

I concur absolutely that these are serious offences that must be dealt with. I have two caveats, however, about what the right hon. Gentleman is trying to do. First, I feel that the existing law should and could deal with all the offences that he has mentioned. The Offences Against the Person Act 1861 and sentencing guidelines ought to be able to deal with all those serious offences. There is no doubt that they need to be dealt with, and that there should be more prosecutions, but I remain to be convinced that existing law does not allow the police to bring that about.

Mr. Forth: I follow my hon. Friend's argument about assault, and I think that the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) covered that matter in his comments and in his conversation with the Minister. Is my hon. Friend equally satisfied, however, about the issue of impeding? The right hon. Gentleman correctly laid a lot of emphasis on making sure that the definition of impeding actions should be made absolutely clear and explicit and that there should be a mechanism to deal with them. Do my hon. Friend's reservations extend to that, or is she happy, as I think that I am now, that the right hon. Gentleman is focusing in on that element of the Bill?

Angela Watkinson: I thank my right hon. Friend for that intervention, as that was going to be my next point. Not having a comprehensive knowledge or understanding of all the legislation on the statute books, I want to hear more about whether existing law allows the offence of impeding to be covered, or whether we need an additional law. Of course, the way in which the impeding is done has a large bearing on this. I would be surprised, for example, if the act of putting a large missile across a road to prevent access by a fire tender was not covered by existing law. Impeding could take a wide range of forms, and I am sure that people might find imaginative ways of doing it. Do we need a separate law simply to cover a loophole in relation to impeding emergency workers attending accident scenes?

My other caveat is about where we draw the line. Who is an "emergency worker"? Were the law extended to include ambulance and fire crews, should it also include nurses and doctors in accident and emergency wards, who, as we know, have to deal with violent and unpleasant people, particularly on Friday and Saturday nights when there has been a lot of binge drinking? Should we include council workers on the council tax desk, in the emergency housing service or in the reception area of a town hall, where people get extremely angry? The hapless council worker who cannot resolve such people's problems is in the front line and often subject to attacks. Should we include social workers who attend people's homes in difficult circumstances, who could be open to violence, insults and attacks? Should we include teachers in schools? Should we include MPs in their surgeries? How far will we let the legislation extend?

I want to be convinced on two points. First, does the law as it stand cover all those eventualities, including the offence of impeding emergency services attending accident scenes?

Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I was following the hon. Lady's remarks carefully, and I was interested in her comments about Members of Parliament. Is it her experience that many constituents make recreational visits to MPs?

Angela Watkinson: As the hon. Gentleman knows, a large proportion of visits to MPs' surgeries are recreational, but do not involve insults or violence. I regard such visits as part of the job, and I am happy to deal with them all.

I hope that the Minister will say whether the existing law covers all those offences, and also whether it should. If it does, why are they not being dealt with more seriously?

Mr. Bailey: I have listened carefully to the hon. Lady's argument, and she has made legitimate and valid points. Does she agree, however, that one of the benefits of the Bill is that it publicly highlights the issue of assaults on public servants across the board, and gives an incentive to all the law enforcement agencies involved to consider measures to protect those who are subject to abuse in carrying out their public duties, irrespective of whether they are technically classified as emergency workers?

Angela Watkinson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that intervention. How far the employer can be responsible for the unquantifiable number of likely attacks on employees is an interesting point.It is incumbent on employers to ensure every possible safeguard for their employees, but some attacks are completely unexpected and executed in more and more imaginative ways. The fallback is that there must be protection in law. We must define the offence of impeding and the groups of people who would be covered. We must also decide which groups of employees would be covered by additional legal safeguards over and above those which every member of the community already enjoys—if that is the right word. Any member of the public who is assaulted has had an offence committed against them. If emergency workers who are assaulted are protected by a special law, will that raise the threshold of proof? Will there have to be additional evidence? If so, I am slightly worried that introducing a special offence might make securing a conviction more difficult.

We all intend, I hope, to ensure that emergency workers are protected in law, that the laws are workable, and that cases can be brought to a satisfactory conclusion in the courts.

10.19 am

Ann Keen (Brentford and Isleworth) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) on coming so high in the ballot, and on his wisdom in choosing this subject.

I am particularly pleased to be able to support the Bill, because I am a former nurse who often worked in the accident and emergency service and greatly valued the teamwork of fire and ambulance crews. We have heard some shocking things from Members today, and the material from the Library contains further shocking information. Reading press releases issued over the past few months, I have been struck by the horror of incidents that had occurred throughout the United Kingdom. I was particularly struck by the fact that ambulance and fire personnel had gone into schools and asked young people to put their hands up if they had ever thrown stones, been abusive or planned attacks on our valued public services. The question was asked without prejudice, so that the young people would feel that they could confess to such actions. As I was not there, I cannot say how it went, but I think we should adopt that approach of confronting the perpetrators.

I believe that the Government's respect agenda will allow us, as Members of Parliament, to go into our communities, meet ambulance and fire personnel and establish what we can do to help them in our constituencies. We should work as a team, which of course we are if we are part of the public sector. Our police are protected, and rightly so, but we unintentionally instil in other "blue light" public servants a sense of being undervalued if we do not afford them the same protection.

I am thinking of people who must work in quite unbelievable circumstances. There was a time, many years ago, when ambulance personnel were thought of as glorified taxi drivers, but people know different now. Our ambulance personnel are extremely well-trained paramedics, with the skill to save our lives and keep us alive while they take us to accident and emergency departments.

I accept what the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) said about nursing and other staff in A and E departments in the spirit in which she meant it, but being in a department is very different from being at the roadside dealing with an incident, and having to be on the scene from the start. Of course, many nurses and doctors will accompany ambulance crews to incidents that require an entire team. Our fire officers do not just fight fires; they may be on the scene to deal with road accidents and other traumatic injuries. If the Bill is passed, our pride in our public servants will be reinforced by the Government and, if we achieve consensus—as I hope we will—by the House.

The "Not Alone" guide, which provides protection for NHS workers, is a step forward. The NHS security management services recognise that training is paramount for those who work alone. I worked as a district nurse for some years, and I worked alone in houses. Finding a house or block of flats and then going in, a district nurse is never entirely sure what awaits her, and may feel very vulnerable. Having a mobile phone may not be enough, because there may be no one back at the centre to take the call at that time of night. The system must become more sophisticated. We have tracking devices now. We have technology that enables us to protect all those who are working to make our lives better, and to help us and our communities through crises.

I want to work with the Government on the respect agenda, and I think that all of us, as Members of Parliament, have a duty to take that agenda into our constituencies. The reason why so many of us are here today to support the Bill is that we have a responsibility to find out what is happening in our areas and what we can do about it, and to pass legislation that will benefit everyone. If we do that, there will come a day when it will no longer be necessary for us to come to the House on Fridays to discuss how we can protect ambulance personnel and firefighters who work for the greater good of us all. We must send the message today that we value all those workers equally.

Richard Younger-Ross (Teignbridge) (LD): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams). As he knows, this issue has been dear to me for a long time. A number of Members on both sides of the House signed early-day motions that I tabled in the last Parliament and in this one, which called for protection for emergency workers in line with that provided in Scotland.

Mr. Alan Williams: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for informing me, when I took the Bill on, that work was in progress to transpose the Scottish legislation to a possible Bill, and I confirm his long-standing interest and support.

Richard Younger-Ross: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his recognition. It gives me great pleasure that we are discussing the Bill today, and it gives me even more pleasure to learn that the right hon. Gentleman has reached a compromise with the Government enabling the Bill to proceed at least in part, if not in total.

I know that any Member who moves the Second Reading of a Bill—such as the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Stephen Pound), who is sitting behind the Minister—must compromise on certain clauses if the Bill is to proceed. That does not mean that others cannot argue that the original intent is worthy of consideration, and challenge the Government to justify the changes that they seek. What must also be justified today, however, is the contention that the offences specified in the Bill cannot be dealt with by existing legislation. That was raised by the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) and by the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), who I am sure will enlighten us further should he be lucky enough to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that if the offences could be dealt with by existing legislation, this debate would be a waste of time and we would do better to press the Government to enforce that legislation. It has become clear to me, however, that the existing law is not working, and is not adequate to deal with the growing number of assaults and cases of services being impeded.

In the last Parliament, I had the pleasure of being part of the Liberal Democrat team shadowing the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. I had special responsibility for the fire and rescue services, and was a member of the Standing Committee considering the Bill that became the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004. That Bill was generally welcomed, and was supported by all three parties in principle if not always in detail. As the party spokesman, I visited different parts of the country to speak to fire crews. I was horrified that, wherever I went, I heard tales of assaults on crews. I visited the Strathclyde control room, which it is particularly worth looking at because the Government plan to reproduce that model across the rest of the United Kingdom. The stories staff told me were similar to those I had heard from the rest of the country. I heard about fire crews not just being attacked but being deliberately set up, with a call being made and an ambush laid across the road. Perhaps a car would be set on fire, or crews would be called to a dead end, pull in, find their way blocked and be stoned and attacked by youths.Such tales will be familiar to ambulance and fire crews in Northern Ireland, but to find that people are doing that for kicks, in a part of the UK where there is not such civil disruption, is a serious and dangerous trend.

The growing number of attacks on nurses in hospitals is again well documented, but, as I acknowledged in an intervention, the Government have taken action to deal with that. When I asked questions about that matter previously, I was told that the Government believed that this legislation was unnecessary because they had already taken steps to deal with the problem, and I accept that a lot of work has been done.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): The incidents that I have been made aware of are to do with binge-drinking, or drink-related violence in hospitals. While the Bill is focusing on protecting workers, as the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) said, a similar amount of work must be done to educate people to realise what they are doing. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the 24-hour licensing laws have exacerbated the current problem?

Richard Younger-Ross: The hon. Gentleman is taking us into a different area, which I do not think is the subject of today's debate. As far as I am aware, in my area, 24-hour licensing has not had a significantly detrimental effect. We will have to wait a while before any proper evidence suggests whether there has been such an effect.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Richard Younger-Ross: I will but I do not want to go too far down that route.

Jim Dowd: I just wondered whether the hon. Gentleman was aware that the managing director of the Wetherspoon's chain was on the radio this morning confirming that since the laws have been revised, the situation has improved, not got worse.

Richard Younger-Ross rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I will endeavour to ensure that we do not go too far down that diversionary path.

Richard Younger-Ross: I thank you for your direction, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was not aware that Tim Martin had said that. He is a constituent of mine—[Interruption.] I stand corrected. Tim has now moved on; he used to be director of that company. The new director made those comments.

I come back to the legislation under discussion. I hope that the Minister will say, and be able to prove in Committee, should we get that far, exactly why the Government wish the assault provisions to be stripped out of the Bill, why they feel that that matter is adequately covered and why the Bill does not aid existing legislation. What is sought, and what I sought in my campaign, is to ensure that emergency workers have equity with the police, who are already offered protection under their own legislation. That comes back to the comments by the hon. Member for Upminster about whether this Bill is creating separate legislation. As I said, such legislation already exists for the police. The Bill extends that protection to other emergency workers who are going about their duty.

When we were brought up in the 1950s and 1960s—and the 1970s and 1980s—the issue was not so important and emergency workers did not require such protection because, to be blunt, assaults were not committed. Times have changed. When times change, it is for us as legislators to ensure that we keep up. That is why I believe that this is an important Bill.

The hon. Lady mentioned the categories of people listed in the Bill. They include members of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution. I have a lifeboat station in my constituency and I am told by members of its crew that, occasionally, people try to impede them and that they have been assaulted when they have been going about their duty. Also included are social workers—there was some cross-Bench chat about that earlier, when some concern was expressed. The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst seemed to be saying that MPs act as social workers. Occasionally, perhaps we do, but not in the context of an emergency.

The Bill clearly defines that a social worker would be protected under the legislation when taking action

"required or permitted by

(i) a care order;

(ii) a supervision order;

(iii) a child assessment order;

(iv) or emergency protection order".

Also covered are approved social workers within the meaning of section 145(1) of the Mental Health Act 1983, chapter 20. There are specific cases where social workers have been attacked, or impeded in going about their duties, which can be deemed, in terms of child care or mental health, to be an emergency within the meaning of the Bill. Measures to protect social workers were added to the Scottish legislation after a Lib Dem amendment was accepted by the Scottish Executive. I am very pleased that they are included in this Bill.

I believe that enough of a case has been made for the Government to answer questions on how they are responding to attacks on emergency workers, and for the Bill to go to Committee stage to be considered in greater detail. If the right hon. Gentleman and other Members are not convinced, they will have an opportunity at a later stage to reject or to vote against the legislation. I urge them at this stage to support the Bill. It should move on to Committee, Report and eventually Third Reading. It is worthy and well supported across the country.

10.37 am

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) on having the perspicacity and good fortune to choose this as a subject for the Bill and on coming high in the ballot. I also congratulate him on his good fortune in having asked me to be one of its sponsors. It means that I am very much in favour of it and will trouble the House only with relatively brief remarks today.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Three hours it is then.

Mr. Dismore: As my hon. Friend says, three hours it is then.

I am chair of the Fire Brigades Union parliamentary group. In that capacity, I have had discussions with the Fire Brigades Union, which wholeheartedly supports the Bill. Before coming to the House, I was the solicitor for the Fire Brigades Union for almost 20 years. In that capacity, I saw many cases of firefighters who were injured as a result of arson or assault. Some injuries were career threatening. Some firefighters even had to retire as a result of what happened to them. For that reason, I strongly welcome the additional protections afforded by the Bill and, in particular, the Government's assurances as to how such offences should be treated in future.

The Fire Brigades Union recently published research showing that attacks on UK fire crews were running at some 40 a week and that the problem was getting worse. The research found that under-reporting meant that the figure could be as high as 120 attacks a week. In some parts of the country, fire crews are served a daily diet of bricks, bottles and missiles as they attempt to fight fires. In other incidents, ambushes have been set for firefighters. The attacks include scaffolding poles being thrown through the windscreens of fire engines. That not only impedes, puts at risk and injures the firefighters but puts the fire engine out of action not only for that fire call but potentially for many other fire incidents that it would otherwise have attended. Crews have been attacked with concrete blocks, bricks and bottles. They have been shot at and spat at. There have been direct physical assaults them. Equipment has been tampered with, stolen or even urinated on. The number and ferocity of the attacks seem to be getting worse. It can never be part of anyone's job to get a brick or bottle in the head as they are simply doing their duty.

Many attacks take place in deprived areas with poor youth facilities and poor housing, where bored young people turn to drugs and alcohol. In some areas there seems to be a culture of recreational violence with fire crews as the targets, often when dealing with fires that those vandals have set themselves to bring the firefighters into the trap that they have created.

Jim Dowd: My hon. Friend said that some 40 attacks happen every week and that that figure could be as high as 120 as a result of under-reporting. Does he think that creating the offence in the Bill would increase the level of reporting to the higher figure, and does he agree that there is currently under-reporting because action is rarely taken?

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend makes an important point. We know that if people have little confidence in the legal system they are less likely to report a crime, whether it be an assault on a firefighter, or other emergency worker, or domestic violence. Domestic violence is now treated much more seriously. The statistics have gone up, not because there is more domestic violence but because women know that if they are subject to it, it will be taken more seriously by the police. Similarly, if we send out the clear message from the House by allowing this Bill to pass through Parliament that we, as parliamentarians, are standing up for our emergency service workers and will not tolerate this, people will report offences more and the legal system will treat them far more seriously.

If firefighters cannot carry out their jobs because of violent assaults, the communities in which those assaults are being committed are being put at risk. Fire crews welcome the Bill because it complements the package of measures that are being put in place to tackle the underlying problem. The FBU hopes that it will get widespread support.

Some important points have been made in the debate about the position of public service workers generally. The Government's position is that the Sentencing

[Mr. Dismore]

Guidelines Council can put forward clearer recommendations to judges and that sentencing can be sufficiently flexible to embrace not only emergency service workers such as fire crews and ambulance staff but public sector workers generally. It cannot be right that anybody serving the public, whether as an emergency worker or more generally—I am thinking of the examples given by the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson)—should be subject to assault or abuse. Everybody doing such a job is entitled to be treated with respect and dignity and to have their customers treat them as the customers would expect to be treated by public service workers.

The proposed new offence of impeding an emergency worker would plug a significant gap in the law, as we have learned from discussions with the fire service. The current law is somewhat vague. The hon. Lady mentioned road blocks. A road block may well be an offence, but there is a world of difference between creating an obstruction on the public highway and obstructing a fire engine or an ambulance on its way to an emergency call. One is potentially a relatively trivial offence that is unlikely to be the subject of prosecution, whereas, under the Bill, the other would be subject to prosecution with, it is to be hoped, a severe sentence as a result.

The new offence would also deal with the problem of traps. My right hon. Friend gave graphic examples of the kinds of traps that can be set. Whether or not such a trap amounted to an assault, it would certainly impede an emergency worker.

Angela Watkinson: When fire service personnel are injured as a result of an attack, that has a career-threatening effect on them because they need to have a high level of fitness and ability. Once that is lowered, it often means the end of their career in that service, as well as possibly reducing their opportunities for further employment; and they could be a very long way from retirement age.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Lady makes an important point. When I was a solicitor for the FBU, I handled many compensation cases on behalf of firefighters who had been injured in such circumstances, some of whom had indeed been unable to continue in their chosen careers.

The proposed impeding offence goes beyond the question of assault. If a fire engine on the way to a fire call is impeded and slowed down, that could result in the loss of valuable minutes in attending that call. Although nobody in the fire crew may have been hurt or directly assaulted, the people depending on that emergency response may find that they have suffered as a result through greater destruction of property, or possibly even injury or loss of life. The new offence would do a great service not only to fire crews and ambulance workers but to the general public as a whole, who may otherwise have their emergency response delayed.

I am pleased that the Ambulance Service Association, which wrote to me the other day, also backs the proposals. It said that "in 2004/05 more than 1300 ambulance staff in England suffered a physical assault from a patient or a patient's carer, relative or friend. The 2004 NHS staff survey shows that nearly half of all ambulance staff had been threatened with assault or subjected to verbal abuse whilst at work in the preceding 12 month period."

That sort of behaviour is wrong and must not only be condemned in this House and by the public at large but treated seriously by our legal system. We must give the courts, the Crown Prosecution Service and the police the tools that they need to do the job, and I believe that the Bill would go a long way towards achieving that.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) said that he had waited 41 years for the chance to promote a private Member's Bill. He may well have set a record. I wish that most colleagues had to wait equally long, but that is probably too much to hope for.

I, too, welcome the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. As has already become clear, it seeks to deal with a problem of which we are all becoming increasingly aware. I suppose that we are entitled to ask why something has not been done before, but that is often the case when we think about legislating in this place. I believe that the Bill seeks to deal with a genuine and urgent problem. However, the right hon. Gentleman himself says that it is not quite right. I wish that more Members would admit that on Second Reading, but they are usually reluctant to do so.

I hope that the way in which the Bill proposes to import elements of Scots law into English law will not set a precedent because, given what I hear about what goes on north of the border in that rather eccentric little Parliament that we unfortunately set up, I hope that we have no intention of following what it does, which seems to be increasingly socialistic, regulatory and eccentric, to say the least. I would rather that we avoided as much of that as possible. Nevertheless, it may be that it very occasionally does something moderately sensible and we should follow its example.

The right hon. Gentleman was, typically, very open with us. I was intrigued to hear that he conducted negotiations with the Minister and her Department, as is sensible with any private Member's Bill, and that they had together rapidly concluded that the Bill in its current form probably should not go on to the statute book. It is not unusual for that negotiation to take place, but rather unusual for it to be so openly described. We are in the odd position of being asked to give a Second Reading to a Bill that is not in the form in which even its promoter wants it to get on to the statute book. He is saying to us, "Trust me, trust the Minister: when the Bill emerges from Committee, it really will be one that you will all want to support." Normally, I would be very reluctant to do anything of the kind, but since it is the right hon. Gentleman and the Minister whom we are talking about, on this occasion the House should be prepared to give them a degree of latitude. As has been pointed out, not least by the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), we can of course pause during subsequent stages and consider the Bill in detail and at leisure, just to make absolutely sure that what the right hon. Gentleman has said today—and what the Minister will doubtless say subsequently—comes to pass.

It is therefore not quite as odd as it may seem that we can look at the Bill's thrust and purpose—and at the objectives as set out by the right hon. Gentleman, and elaborated on today—make our judgment on that basis and agree that there is a real problem to be dealt with, that there is a real necessity for a Bill, and that this Bill is the vehicle to allow us to deal with it. Once we have listened to the Minister and the Bill has gone into Committee, we can look at it again on Report and Third Reading, and I hope, if I may say so helpfully to the right hon. Gentleman, that he does not leave that process too late or allow it to take too long. Time runs out rather quickly in the private Member's Bill process, so he should look at the calendar and bear it in mind that the other place will have to consider the Bill, as well. If it gets a Second Reading today—I am very confident that it will—I urge him to try to see it through Committee as quickly as possible and to bring it back here in good time, so that the House can consider it and get it into shape.

All in all, this is an auspicious day. I again congratulate the right hon. Gentleman and I hope that he does not have to wait quite so long for his next private Member's Bill.

Kitty Usher (Burnley) (Lab): I, too, begin by congratulating my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) not only on coming so high up in the ballot, but on seeking to legislate on such an important subject. I have the greatest respect for him, not least because of the help and support that he has given to me as an extremely new member of the Public Accounts Committee. He has considerable experience as a member of that Committee, and I thank him for his help.

I am pleased to be here to support my right hon. Friend's Bill this morning. It is the first time since I was elected last May that I have remained in Parliament on a Friday; I shall be back in my constituency tonight. I am actually here to support the next Bill on the Order Paper—I promised a group my constituents who are extremely exercised by the issue of planning permission for mobile phone masts that I would do so. However, it is a pleasure to support, in passing, my right hon. Friend. I shall keep my remarks extremely brief in my desire to enable him to secure a Second Reading.

I share my right hon. Friend's outrage at the instances of assault on emergency workers. These people have dedicated their lives to public service—a fact that the public should respect in the way that they treat them. I am therefore glad that, thanks to the work of my right hon. Friend and other hon. Friends, Ministers have a renewed focus on the need to ensure that sentencing guidelines for the existing offence of assault take account to the greatest possible extent of the fact that the victims of such assaults work in the public services. Indeed, we have a manifesto commitment to do that, and I am all in favour of manifesto commitments being delivered on as soon as possible. I hope that the negotiations that my right hon. Friend and others have held with the Department on this issue will lead to that commitment being realised sooner, rather than later. I also hope that the Bill will have a deterrent effect on those who seek to perpetrate such horrible offences.

I note, however, that the number of such offences is falling. I am told that the figure is down from 37,776 in 2003–04 to 11,482 in 2004–05, the last year for which data are available. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) said that much of such crime is unreported, but I hope that this downward trend can nevertheless continue.

There is no doubt that the influence of alcohol plays an important part in such assaults, as others have pointed out this morning. In my constituency, there is a significant problem with assaults in the accident and emergency department of Burnley general hospital. I cannot imagine anything worse than sitting there in some pain while delays are caused by altercations and acts of aggression against hospital and ambulance staff.

I want to raise a particular issue, to which I hope the Minister can respond. Sometimes assaults are racially motivated, and I have certainly heard of such incidents occurring in my constituency. I find it absolutely abhorrent that some members of the public—under the influence of alcohol or otherwise—assault hard-working public service workers simply because they are from a different ethnic group from their own. I hope that the Minister can reassure me that the double whammy of racially aggravated assault against emergency workers will be dealt with extremely severely, and that she is negotiating with the Sentencing Guidelines Council to ensure that that happens.

I welcome my right hon. Friend's pragmatic decision to amend the Bill to close a loophole, so that those who impede emergency workers can be dealt with with the severity that such an offence deserves. I hope that, in the light of that amendment, all Members will ensure that the Bill proceeds to the next stage.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) on introducing this Bill, on having responded to pressure from representatives of emergency service workers, and on the transparent and accommodating way in which he has worked with the Government in order to make progress on this issue.

There clearly is a problem, in that although existing legislation deals in theory with a range of such crimes, it demonstrably is not as effective as it should be. It is obvious from the Government's response and from negotiations with the Sentencing Guidelines Council that steps are being taken to ensure that the failure of legislation to deal with the problem will be addressed. None the less, it is also obvious that a range of offences are being perpetrated against emergency workers that are not covered by existing legislation. I welcome my right hon. Friend's recognition of that fact, and his willingness to abandon elements of his proposals that might have complicated existing legislation, so that the Bill can make progress.

The Bill will do a number of things to assist in dealing with the problem. For a start, it will go some way toward addressing what must be a demoralising experience for emergency service workers. How often do we read newspaper headlines lauding to the skies the efforts of fire service workers and ambulance crews? Any straw poll of the public would show that emergency workers number among the most highly rated people in this country. One can only try to understand how demoralising it must be for them to be confronted with the violence and obstruction that seems to form part of their daily lives in pursuing their duties. To date, the Government, and even the wider public, have not focused on this problem sufficiently. The Bill will perhaps help to raise such workers' morale, and help them to feel that the Government and the public are concerned and are going to do something about this problem.

The Bill is important in another way. If people are not confident that action will be taken when they report a criminal offence, their inclination is not to bother to report it. By drawing public attention to the issue and demonstrating that action is being taken, the Bill will—I hope—encourage people, not only in the emergency services but in other public services, to report such attacks. That will put pressure on employers and law enforcement agencies to do something about the problem.

Andrew Stunell: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Fire Brigades Union and many firefighters say that many incidents are not reported for exactly the reasons he gives. Fire brigade officers and staff in my constituency in Greater Manchester are very concerned that the issue is not taken seriously enough because of that under-reporting.

Mr. Bailey: The hon. Gentleman's evidence accords with my personal experience and other reports from elsewhere. The irony is that the enactment of the Bill might prompt a surge in the number of offences, but that might misrepresent what is happening. It is because it would be apparent that we are doing something about the problem that the reporting of offences might increase.

My right hon. Friend described a range of incidents that he had uncovered in his work on the Bill, and they are probably reflected in the experience of many other hon. Members. I have several examples from the west midlands. I intervened on my right hon. Friend to describe a bizarre, so-called happy slapping incident, and the Bill might offer a potential way to deal with such incidents. A couple of years ago, there was an incident at West Bromwich bus station when two female ambulance service personnel answered a distress call. On arriving, they found someone who was drunk and who proceeded to assault them physically. As if that were not bad enough, some more drunken young people weighed in on the assault, although it might have been thought that those two ladies would have enjoyed the support of the public in that critical situation. Not only was the assault a disturbing and traumatic experience for those two young ladies, but their services were lost to the ambulance service for a considerable time. It is an appalling reflection on our society that such assaults should go unprosecuted.

We have also heard about incidents involving the fire service. In the west midlands, in 2004 there were 76 attacks on firefighters, and in 2005 there were no fewer than 143. We should be cautious about the use of such statistics, because they may reflect an increase in reporting and a greater awareness of the problem, but one incident in Coventry stands out, in which someone tried to drop a car battery on a firefighter from the 16th floor of a tower block. Happily, it missed, but one can only wonder at the vicious mindlessness of someone who is prepared to perpetrate such an attack. Public service workers who have to run such risks in carrying out their duties deserve our sympathy and support.

My right hon. Friend has described the incidents in Manchester and Merseyside, so I shall not repeat them. Many of the incidents are a result of drink or drugs—mainly drink. We have discussed the potential impact of the changes in licensing laws on the problem and I happen to believe that dealing with such incidents is not only a matter of legislating to prevent them, but of legislating against antisocial behaviour in a range of areas. Although it is too early to make any definitive pronouncements, there is some evidence that the changes in licensing laws are having an impact, and that will need to be carefully monitored to see whether any amendment to the law is needed to prevent such incidents.

The Government must also consider diversionary activities, especially for young people. My hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen) commented on the attempts made by firefighters to visit schools to talk to young people. That could be taken further. If we could show young people how the emergency services work—within the health and safety requirements—it might provide a bonding effect in communities that could prevent some of the incidents that we have heard about today.

Mr. Ellwood: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is some irony in what he has just said? For many years as I was growing up, I wanted to be a fireman—

Stephen Pound: Firefighter.

Mr. Ellwood: Well, I am a man, so I would have been a fireman. We now have a generation who do not want to be firefighters, but instead want to cause them harm. That is why we need an emphasis on education.

Mr. Bailey: The hon. Gentleman makes a valid point, although many areas have long waiting lists for becoming firefighters. Many people still recognise that firefighting is an important, valid and rewarding occupation. However, I agree that it is ironic that a small minority of people appear to be prepared to act in such a profoundly antisocial way for no obvious or logical reason.

Richard Younger-Ross: At the opening of the new fire station in Teignmouth, I was told that there is now a waiting list for the Teign fire crews. The hon. Gentleman mentions the fact that fire brigades are working with young people, but is he aware that some sadly feel constrained in doing so because the new legislation does not contain a duty of well-being for the combined fire services that now stand alone, outside the auspices of local authority control? The Government could consider providing those fire services with a duty of well-being that would allow them to do more of the work to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr. Bailey: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point, although I cannot comment on the details about his constituency. In general, we need to take a fresh look at the legislative and regulatory approach so that we can encourage our young people to engage with our public services and understand just how they operate. We need to think outside the box. Changes in legislation that may not appear to have immediate relevance to the issue will in fact have an impact on it and we need to be aware of that.

The Bill will encourage a more proactive engagement of all the public services, especially the police, with the fire brigades and ambulance services, with better co-ordination to ensure that there are more prosecutions. As was pointed out earlier, there is a lack of prosecutions under existing law, so by focusing public attention on the issue the Bill will go some way towards ensuring that all the agencies establish procedures to provide more evidence and an extra incentive for the Crown Prosecution Service to undertake more prosecutions.

The antisocial behaviour order agenda could be a way of restricting the activities of certain antisocial young people who try to perpetrate vicious ambushes and stunts on the emergency services. In a small but significant number of areas, there seems to be a culture in which violence against members of the public services is part of a game designed for kicks—a sort of video nasty that is not on video. We must break that culture, and although the legislation cannot deal with all the social and psychological problems that lie behind that pattern of activity, it will undoubtedly be part of our armoury in taking action against it.

I welcome the Bill. It cannot solve the problem alone, but by making it easier to prosecute people who deliberately impede those who carry out vital emergency services it will go some way towards addressing the problem. A secondary impact of the Bill, which may be more profound in the long run, is that it will focus attention on the issue and may stimulate other action to address the problem.

11.13 am

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) on the Bill and thank him for asking me to be one of its sponsors. I have enjoyed working with him and learned much from his experience, as we negotiated with the Home Office and representatives of the emergency services, who gave us the benefit of their wisdom and experience. I certainly hope that the Bill will become law and that it will protect emergency service personnel who need and deserve our protection.

It is one of the most wicked things that people think it is funny deliberately to try to entice into a trap and set upon people with a sense of public service who attend because it is their job to protect the public. It is a waste of resources. It wastes the time of emergency workers. It is dangerous and it undermines the ethos of public services that we should support and develop. I will support anything that tackles that. The Bill is one step among other measures, including the respect agenda, which is an important aspect.

In my constituency, a gang of boys on the Bemerton estate regularly call out the emergency services, especially the fire brigade. When the firefighters arrive, the boys throw stones at them. Things are getting worse and I am concerned that they will get out of hand. The Bill recognises the seriousness of the offence and will cut into criminal behaviour at a certain level, so that it can be dealt with before it spirals out of control.

The Bill is well judged and it has my support. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his wisdom in choosing this matter to bring before the House. It keys in excellently with our respect agenda. The Bill has my full support and I wish it well—as I do the next Bill, so I shall keep my contribution as short as possible so that it, too, can get through.

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), first, on securing the opportunity to present a Bill and, secondly, on choosing such an important topic, which is close to all our hearts.

It is important to remember that although 99.9 per cent. of the population, and indeed 99.9 per cent. of our young people, always show the utmost respect to our emergency workers—as they sincerely deserve—a number of people, unfortunately, do not. That small number of individuals takes up a disproportionate amount of the time and attention of the emergency services. Their behaviour is completely reprehensible and we need to send them a clear message: not only is impeding or assaulting emergency workers unacceptable in itself, it also delays them and prevents them from dealing effectively and efficiently with the victims of an emergency, with possibly tragic consequences.

I know only too well from my career as a teacher and schools inspector that we have to spell out the law clearly. We must make it absolutely clear that any form of insulting, impeding or assaulting emergency workers is wholly unacceptable. We must give the highest possible level of protection to our firefighters, our ambulance staff, our coastguards, our prison officers, our social workers and the staff in our hospitals, who frequently deal with extremely difficult and dangerous circumstances.

Whether we like it or not, our young people, and the population in general, are more fearful of, and thus more respectful towards, police officers than they are of emergency workers. The Bill will send a clear message that emergency workers must be given the same respect as the police. It must be backed by continuing efforts in schools to drive home the message that we will not tolerate any attack, whether verbal or physical, on emergency workers. It will be much easier to get that message across if teachers can tell young people that impeding or assaulting an emergency worker is as serious an offence as impeding or assaulting a police officer.

We must also send out a clear message that being under the influence of alcohol is not an excuse to be rude, unco-operative or aggressive towards any emergency worker. Perhaps all bottles and cans of alcohol should carry the warning: "Alcohol can cause people to indulge in behaviour that they subsequently regret. Being under the influence of alcohol is no excuse in law"—although another Member may be able phrase it more simply. We might also consider doubling the penalties for any offence committed under the influence of alcohol.

[Nia Griffith]

It is high time that we, the overwhelming, law-abiding majority, showed our support for our emergency workers, and made it absolutely clear to the small despicable minority that we shall tolerate no form of assault, aggression or verbal abuse towards any member of our very valuable emergency services.

11.19 am

Barbara Keeley (Worsley) (Lab): I too welcome the Bill introduced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and I congratulate him on his campaign to raise the issues it addresses. These are important issues affecting our emergency workers; we have heard today how they suffer from the modern scourge of unwarranted assaults while they are trying to save lives.

Although the measures in the Bill would evidently attract support from Members on both sides of the House, my support stems from the fact that Greater Manchester has one of the worst records for attacks on firefighters, so I shall focus on that branch of the emergency services. There have, unfortunately, been some 350 attacks on firefighters in Greater Manchester in the past two years. The Manchester Evening News has run an effective campaign to focus attention on the issue, and I commend the paper and its reporter, Neal Keeling, for doing so.

It is clear that within Greater Manchester, Salford, which is one of the two local authorities covered by my Worsley constituency, has a technical problem with assaults and attacks on firefighters—a record that Salford's MPs would like to lose as soon as we can. A recent example from Salford highlighted in the Manchester Evening News concerned a fire engine being vandalised and burgled as the fire crew worked to rescue a woman and her 12-year-old son from their burning home. To damage a fire engine while the fire crew is working to save lives is seriously to risk loss of human life.

Hon. Members will have read the articles and briefings cataloguing the increasingly severe nature of attacks on firefighters, involving, as we have heard today, many cases of arson and the setting of deliberate traps for fire crews. Yesterday, Councillor Fred Walker, chair of the Greater Manchester fire authority, told me of the problems encountered by our fire crews. Fires have been deliberately set at the bottom of a terrace in a cul-de-sac. Fire crews raced to the scene and found that they had been cornered—bricks and other objects were thrown at them while they tried to put out fires. Also of great concern to Councillor Walker is the trend, described by my right hon. Friend, of causing fires in abandoned buildings after laying traps specifically to hurt firefighters attending the scene.

I find the callous and deliberate nature of those attacks absolutely chilling. It is vital that both our fire services and the police treat each incident of attacks and assaults on firefighters with the seriousness that the incidents deserve.

As I have mentioned, Greater Manchester comes out badly in the statistics compiled by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, as do Merseyside and the west midlands. However, other areas such as London record a very low number of incidents, and there seems to be an issue of under-reporting.

The fire service and elected Members serving in fire authorities also want to see attacks and assaults on fire crews treated seriously following prosecutions. There is seen to be a difficulty when a fine is imposed, given that most offenders are juveniles who do not have the means to pay a fine. It is welcome that antisocial behaviour orders are increasingly used to deal with those who attack firefighters; given that most of those concerned are juveniles, parenting orders also have a role to play.

Councillor Walker told me that he would also like the courts to make increasing use of community penalties. There are a number of worthwhile community schemes, jointly run by the fire service and organisations such as the Prince's Trust. Greater Manchester fire service has a young firefighters scheme, which focuses on boys and young men in target areas where there is the most violence against crews. The aim is to work with the type of kids who are non-joiners—who do not engage with these services or with out-of-school activities. If those young people can understand the work of the fire services at a younger age, it can help dissuade them from getting involved in attacks on fire crews as they get older.

The Prince's Trust also has a 13-week scheme for young people, run in conjunction with the fire service and football clubs such as Manchester United. Young people completing the scheme get a certificate of attainment, which can improve their employment prospects as the scheme is highly regarded by employers. I commend the fire service and the Prince's Trust for their community schemes, because those can both help young people and develop better support for the fire service within the community.

Although I have focused on attacks on firefighters, attacks on doctors, nurses, paramedics and ambulance crews are of equal concern and I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen) for highlighting those concerns.

It is right and timely that we should focus on the issues faced by our emergency workers. The Government's respect agenda gives us an additional framework so that Members of Parliament and councillors can work with the police and emergency workers to deal with the problems in their area; I fully intend to do so in my constituency.

We also need better recording of incidents, and better follow-up of incidents by the police, resulting in prosecutions wherever possible. Finally, we need imaginative and appropriate sentencing to deter future attacks.

11.25 am

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I think it is agreed across the House that we are discussing a very serious problem. Assaults on people at work in the emergency services and our public services are at an unacceptably high level. The latest figures show that in 2004–05 there were more than 11,000 physical assaults against national health service acute services staff. I know from just one of the NHS trusts serving my constituency that there were 163 physical assaults on staff in the last financial year, and 183 the year before.

That brings home to me the scale of the problem. There were more than 1,300 physical assaults on NHS ambulance staff across the country in 2004–05.

We also know that this is a growing problem. In my local ambulance service, violent incidents against staff increased from 221 in 2001–02 to 300 the following year. I am sure that hon. Members from both sides of the House will be able to relay the fact that this is not only an issue of great public concern but one that is clearly increasing, and therefore merits serious consideration of what further measures are necessary to tackle it.

Hon. Members have expressed some objections to the Bill and it is worth our reflecting on them. Whereas there seems to be a consensus across the House that a new offence of impeding an emergency service worker is needed, reservations have been expressed—I suspect that we may hear them from the Minister—about creating a new offence of assaulting an emergency services worker. It is contended, first, that existing legislation is adequate to deal with such assaults; and, secondly, that a specific offence of assaulting an emergency worker or somebody working in public services might make it harder to prosecute those offences. It is argued against those views that, as has been pointed out, there is already a separate offence in Scotland, giving protection specifically to emergency service workers, passed by the Scottish Parliament last year, and there is of course an existing separate offence of assaulting a police officer.

At one stage the Government did take the view that specific measures were necessary to deal with this problem. The Labour election manifesto said,

"we will introduce tougher sentences. . . for those convicted of assaulting workers serving the public."

But those tougher sentences did not feature in the Violent Crime Reduction Bill, and when my hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) moved amendments to create an offence of violence against a public servant, addressing broadly the same problem that this Bill seeks to address, the Government rejected that approach, preferring to rely on sentencing guidelines as expressed by the Sentencing Guidelines Council, that assaults on people working in the public sector are aggravated. It is true that the number of convictions for attacking, for example, NHS staff has risen. However, we must consider whether Parliament needs to send a stronger signal both to express concern about assaults on emergency service workers and to deter people from committing such offences in future.

My judgment is that we need to send such a signal, partly because of the increase in the number of offences and the scale of the problem that exists and partly because, as has been pointed out, the effect of assaulting or impeding an emergency service worker could put the public at risk if those workers are taken out of action. So harm is being done not just to the people who work in the services, but to the public broadly. Therefore, on public policy grounds, a specific offence or an aggravated offence to stop that may well be justified.

I am not persuaded by what I have heard so far about the Government's reasons for rejecting a specific offence of assaulting an emergency services worker or, indeed, of creating some kind of aggravated offence, not least because Parliament has accepted already that certain offences should be considered as aggravated—for instance, racially motivated attacks—and it has proved perfectly possible to prosecute people for those offences. I am not sure whether the obstacles that people sometimes claim will be placed in the way of the specific offence are necessarily viable, but I will listen very carefully to what the Minister has to say.

After examining the Bill and listening to what the right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and other Members said, I share the consensus that these issues should be examined in Committee. People who work in public services do a vital job, often in difficult circumstances, and we all rely on them. The House should send a very clear signal that we believe that assaults on ambulance staff, firefighters, doctors and nurses are totally unacceptable. For that reason, we support the Bill. I hope that it will receive a Second Reading and that these detailed issues will be examined in Committee, so that the precise need for and wording of additional measures can be scrutinised. I very much hope that the Government will share what is clearly a great deal of support for the Bill on both sides of the House.

11.32 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Fiona Mactaggart): I start by thanking the Father of the House for giving us the opportunity to demonstrate the consensus that exists among hon. Members on both sides of the House in our admiration of and support for emergency services workers, who risk their lives for us all regularly. The emergency services represent a powerful statement of the way in which we in society care for one another. It is an important symbol of our civilisation that they provide a platform of security on which we can depend when we face an emergency, thus helping us to work better as a society and the individual members of society to feel more secure in facing the challenges that we face.

We have had a classic Second Reading debate. We have demonstrated broad consent about the issues. We have raised queries about the precise way in which the Bill might deal with the issues about which hon. Members are concerned. I hope to be able to deal fully with two fundamental issues—first, how we deal with assaults on emergency workers, and secondly, how we deal with those who impede emergency workers.

Ann Keen: Will my hon. Friend explain the current offence of impeding a firefighter, because it is still not quite clear to me?

Fiona Mactaggart: Certainly. That is an important part of the point that I was about to come to, which was raised by the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson). Is there a gap in the law, and if so, where are the spaces? That is a perfectly proper question to address. We have an offence under section 44(3) of the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004, which is in force and states:

"A person commits an offence if without reasonable excuse he obstructs or interferes with an employee of a fire and rescue authority taking action authorised under this section."

In practice, one of the frustrations for the fire services has been that it has sometimes proved quite difficult to fulfil all the requirements of section 44 for a specific offence, because a fire officer must show that he has been "authorised in writing" to do certain things. That can be a quite laborious process, and it seems to be one of the things that has occasionally inhibited the success of prosecutions.

The House is absolutely agreed: in every contribution, I have heard a belief that we should have an effective prosecutorial mechanism to protect emergency service workers from being obstructed. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) for his willingness to use the Bill to create a simpler, more straightforward offence of impeding or obstructing that could perhaps fulfil all the specific requirements under the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004. Of course there is no such offence in relation to ambulance workers, but he is trying to create a simple offence, whereby we could deal with the gap in the law for emergency service workers across the board.

Mr. Bailey: Perhaps the Minister will address this point in the fullness of time; but just in case, may I pre-emptively ask her what assessment has been made of how the Scottish legislation has worked so far? As we have a body of legislation that covers the offence of assault, what assessment has she made of why problems have arisen in bringing sufficient prosecutions to deter this form of activity?

Fiona Mactaggart: I hope that my hon. Friend will forgive me if I do not immediately respond to those questions, because I believe that what I will say later will answer them. If I do not fully answer them, I invite him to intervene on me again, but I hope that it will be easier for hon. Members to hear the response to those points later in my speech, because it will then make better sense to them.

I shall deal with the question of whether we need legislation on assault—I will refer to the Scottish experience—and with whether there are gaps in the offence of impeding. I have already addressed to a degree some of the defects in the existing legislation, but are there further gaps? If there is a gap in the law, who should be covered and what action should be taken? Is this all a matter for the courts—or, as some hon. Members have said, can it be dealt with by taking further action, including the work that we are already doing with the respect action plan and so on?

Assault is the most serious aspect, and following my assurances and explanations the Father of the House, who is promoting the Bill, has generously agreed to focus not on assault but on amendments to address a gap in the law. Comprehensive measures in our existing law already deal properly with assault and attacks in a wide range of circumstances. The offences include common assault, actual bodily harm, which is committed if a person's injuries are more than superficial, and grievous bodily harm, which is a very serious offence. Shockingly, emergency service workers have been the victims of those more serious forms of assault. A wide range of penalties can be imposed for the different criminal behaviours associated with assault and other violence. The sentence for common assault can be a maximum of six months' imprisonment or a fine of up to £5,000, and the sentence for grievous bodily harm, manslaughter or murder can be life imprisonment.

Those offences cover everyone, so we do not think that we need a specific offence of assault on emergency workers. Such a provision would add nothing to the existing law, and, as I was explaining to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen), a specific offence could cause complications because a person's specific circumstances at the time of the assault would have to be proved, which could have the unintentional effect of inhibiting a successful prosecution. I hope that we will be able to amend the Bill substantially in Committee. It would provide for a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment for such an offence, but that is the same penalty as the maximum sentence for common assault. The provision would thus add nothing practical to the protection that the law already offers.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): If an offence of common assault, actual bodily harm or grievous bodily harm were committed against a member of the emergency services, do sentencing guidelines say that the sentence should be weighted? Will the Minister comment on the position of the Sentencing Guidelines Council?

Fiona Mactaggart: I will explain fully the way in which the Sentencing Guidelines Council works later, but it may be helpful if I quote from the overarching principles that it issued in December 2004. Paragraph 1.23 identifies "Factors indicating a more than usually serious degree of harm" that must be taken into account when determining a sentence. One such factor is:

"Offence is committed against those working in the public sector or providing a service to the public".

It is obvious from the debate that Parliament takes seriously the problem affecting people who perform the special duty of providing emergency services. However, such people are already covered by a specific aspect of the guidance on seriousness, and we hope that the Sentencing Guidelines Council will consider the matter further.

Richard Younger-Ross: Does the Minister not accept that when dealing with assault, it is important to make it clear, to young people especially, that emergency workers are a special case because they save people's lives? That point is rather lost in the guidance of the Home Office and the courts on how things should be weighted. I do not know of many 16-year-olds who would say, "Oh, this is weighted, so I won't do it." If there were a clear red line to say that an assault on such workers would be an aggravated assault, they would be more likely to take account of that.

Fiona Mactaggart: We need to be honest about what influences 16-year-olds' behaviour. The hon. Gentleman is right that guidance from the Sentencing Guidelines Council does not tend to make much difference to them, but I am not convinced that the existence of an aggravating factor does, either. Sentencing can have an impact if it has serious and clear consequences. It is important to use education and community sentences. We must ensure that the message that we have been sharing with each other during the debate is not kept in the confines of the Chamber, but spread more widely by campaigns such as the protect our heroes campaign, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Worsley (Barbara Keeley) and is run by the Manchester Evening News, and the respect campaign. The message must go out to young people that emergency workers could save their mums, families, or friends. We must decide the most effective technique that will ensure that people who are tempted to commit such an offence are deterred—that is what all of us want—and that those who commit the offence are effectively prosecuted and convicted.

Nick Herbert: The Minister said that a specific additional offence would add nothing to the existing law, and expressed scepticism about whether aggravated offences add anything—so does she think that racially aggravated offences add nothing to the existing law?

Fiona Mactaggart: No, I am absolutely certain that they add a great deal to the law. Let me say why, and explain why the offence that we are talking about is different. We made a substantial change to the law to ensure that there was a specific aggravating factor for racially and religiously motivated offences of all kinds because of what happens when an offence is committed against a person in a category shared by many other people in the community. If a person is attacked because of their faith or race, other members of the same community are terrorised. Such an act should be a statutory aggravating offence because of the terrorising effect on those who share the person's characteristics. An assault on a person would not have the same terrorising effect on those who shared his or her profession. None the less, emergency workers need to be properly protected, so if I can make progress with my speech I will describe the actions that we will take to deliver that. There is consensus in the House about what we want to achieve. If hon. Members give me time to explain how we can do that, we can get consensus on that, too.

We all know about the vulnerability of private Members' legislation; indeed, the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) mentioned it in a slightly guarded way. I hope that we can build consensus about the important lacunae that exist in the law and use this opportunity to deal with them. We should not try to move forward with private Members' legislation on too wide a front so as to put its progress at risk.

Ann Keen: Thank you for giving way. At the point of my intervention, you were describing quite rightly—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As the hon. Lady has now committed the offence a second time, I must point out that when she says "you", she is referring to me. I am sure that that is not what she intends.

Ann Keen: My apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I spoke earlier about what is almost antisocial behaviour among young people and about the respect agenda. Will the Minister give any more information about how Government legislation on those matters can assist this Bill?

Fiona Mactaggart: Absolutely. I shall come on to that issue. As well as specific parts of the respect campaign that can make a positive contribution, we have developed some other important tools and techniques. We have developed antisocial behaviour orders and measures to deal with parenting, such as parenting orders, allowing us to intervene early and use schemes such as those mentioned by some hon. Members to educate and engage young people, perhaps with their local fire services, for example. All such measures can make a difference.

I think that our consensus is not only about catching, prosecuting and convicting those who are guilty of assaulting and obstructing emergency service workers, but about preventing such activities from happening. Having listened to the debate, I think that there is a very clear view that although catching, prosecuting and convicting are one very important tool in prevention, as has been shown by the work of the NHS security authority, education can also play a role. The respect agenda includes the possibility of providing such education.

I described why I felt it was unnecessary to include in the assault offence a statutory aggravating factor, which the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) mentioned. Indeed, I think that it is also unnecessary to have a wholly separate assault offence. As I said, assault is assault, and it is proper that we should deal effectively with all assaults and violent crime. We need to seek as far as possible to resist the temptation to over-complicate the law by creating very specific offences. As I said, such offences are often difficult to prove and act as another burden when matters are dealt with in court.

Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen) (Lab): Does the Minister agree that the situation in Scotland is not really comparable? The Scots created a new offence partly to ensure that courts would sentence appropriately for such actions, whereas elsewhere we have the Sentencing Guidelines Council, which does not exist in Scotland.

Fiona Mactaggart: That is absolutely true. The Sentencing Guidelines Council provides a mechanism that can read across to all sorts of offences. For example, there are other at-risk groups: other public sector workers are rightly included in the present overarching principles, which also cover teachers who are beaten up by angry parents. Such issues should be a factor that is dealt with in sentencing. It is inappropriate that someone who is serving the public by teaching children should be more vulnerable because they are in that situation.

It is therefore wrong to try to over-complicate the law by slicing off little bits and creating legislative ghettos if we can deal with the problem properly under existing law. I hope to persuade hon. Members that we can do that within the scope of a single offence. That means better constructed, less complicated and clearer law and greater ease in securing prosecutions. I believe that we all agree that people need to understand the law. Some hon. Members suggested that adding bells and whistles to it will make it easier to understand but I do not accept that. The law needs to work well on the ground and creating different offences for different groups of people is a recipe for confusion.

Mr. Ellwood: If I understand the Under-Secretary correctly, she is not willing to give special treatment to people who expose themselves to danger far more than the rest of us. Is she aware of the success of such measures in America, where the extra powers to protect the police and the fire and ambulance services have acted as a deterrent to attacks on them?

Fiona Mactaggart: I am, of course, willing to give those people extra protection—the debate is about the most effective mechanism for doing that. If the hon. Gentleman has listened carefully, he will have heard my commitment to my right hon. Friend to work with the Sentencing Guidelines Council to ensure that the sentencing guidelines mechanism, which does not exist in Scotland, is used to ensure a more effective penalty.

Clear evidence exists to show that a separate offence does not necessarily produce lengthier sentences. There is a specific offence of assaulting a police officer in the execution of his duty, and in some ways it is common sense to have such an offence. Police are different from other emergency service workers because obstructing or assaulting a police officer is often part of a pattern of criminality. Someone who tries to impede a police officer might be trying to prevent their own capture and conviction and that is one of the reasons for the separate offence.

However, let us consider the sentencing for that offence, which carries the same maximum penalty as that suggested in the Bill. The penalty is the same as that for common assault. In the past two years, however, those sentenced to custody for assaulting a police officer have received slightly lower sentences than those convicted of common assault. In 2003, the average sentence for assaulting a police officer was 2.8 months as opposed to three months for common assault. In 2004, the average sentence for assaulting a police officer was 2.9 months compared with 3.1 months for common assault. I concede that the differences are not large but they show that a specific offence does not guarantee a more effective penalty.

Let us not split hairs—let us focus on what we agree about. Hon. Members from all parties want someone who is convicted of assault on an emergency service worker to receive a sentence that reflects the seriousness with which the House views such an offence. That is common ground.

Mr. Bailey: I fully understand my hon. Friend's point but I am worried about the statistics that she cited. It appears that the courts regard assaulting a policeman as less significant than assaulting a member of the public. Are discussions being held with the Sentencing Guidelines Council to assess why that is the case and whether anything is being done about it?

Fiona Mactaggart: I—

Mr. Forth: Just say no.

Fiona Mactaggart: I am having discussions. I had intended a little later in my remarks to describe how the Sentencing Guidelines Council operates, so I shall proceed to that if it helps hon. Members. I have mentioned the existing sentencing guidelines—the over-arching principle of seriousness. A consultation by the Sentencing Guidelines Council is under way, dealing with violent crime and specifically assault. We will work with the council to ensure that it is fully aware of the circumstances of emergency workers and the unique dangers that offences of assault or obstruction can involve when they are directed against emergency workers.

Let us be clear about the nature of the Sentencing Guidelines Council. It is not just a guidance council. It is an important body chaired by the Lord Chief Justice. It has seven judicial members, including a district judge and a lay justice, and four non-judicial members with experience of one or more of the following—policing, criminal prosecution, criminal defence and the interests of victims. In the process of producing guidelines, there is wide consultation and an opportunity for Ministers and Parliament through the Home Affairs Committee to contribute to consideration of what should be contained in the guidelines. The council is supported by the Sentencing Advisory Panel, an independent body originally set up to provide advice to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) rose—

Fiona Mactaggart: I am trying to be generous in taking interventions, but the difficulty is that I could end up being confusing. I will, however, give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Evennett: I have listened with great interest to the Minister. Her approach is very worthy, but what is needed is action, not more consultation and talk. We want something done.

Fiona Mactaggart: As I have pointed out to the hon. Gentleman, we already have action in the overriding principles of December 2004. We are in the process of developing the sentencing guidelines on violent crime. The process has started. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that it is a slightly lengthy process, but I predict that it will come to a conclusion at about the time that we would be able to implement the offence proposed in the Bill. It is not an instant process. We are dealing with sentencing for crime so it is, rightly, a properly elaborated process, but a powerful process. It is not vague. It has specific aspects, including a duty properly to consult, and I do not accept that that is a bad thing.

Mr. Ellwood rose—

Fiona Mactaggart: I am about to describe how the process will work with respect to violent crime, but I shall first give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ellwood: I must go back to the statistics, which show how damaging the current system is. We want to move the level of protection for the fire service and the ambulance service up to that for the police, yet the statistics prove that even the police are not getting the protection that they want. Surely we should consider compiling a new set of laws that bring all three services up to the same standard.

Fiona Mactaggart: I am afraid the hon. Gentleman has not understood. I do not mean to patronise him, but I pointed out that introducing a separate offence does not guarantee the outcome that he and I both want—that a sentence for an assault on a worker who is protecting the public should reflect the seriousness with which Parliament views such assaults. We both agree on that.

The hon. Gentleman suggests that the way to achieve that is by creating a separate and specific offence. I have pointed out how the use of a separate and specific offence in relation to the police does not achieve that end. However, I am in the middle of describing—I will finish, and when I finish I hope the hon. Gentleman will accept the point that I am making—the way in which the sentencing guidelines procedure works, and the fact that the Sentencing Guidelines Council is in the process of consulting about how it should treat violent crimes, including assault.

Jim Dowd: On that point, part of the difficulty is that my hon. Friend has not outlined the full statistical position on assaulting a police officer compared with common assault because she has not told us either the difference in the number of prosecutions in each category or the conviction rates vis-à-vis both categories.

My hon. Friend has spent a lot of time talking about assault on individuals. What about attacks on vehicles being used by emergency services in their work? I am particularly minded of the recent FA cup match between Manchester United and Liverpool. A Manchester United player suffered an horrific injury and had to be taken from the ground in an ambulance, which was pelted with bottles and glasses by a scandalous minority, although I do not know whether they were Liverpool supporters or not. Would such disgraceful behaviour be covered by a separate offence of obstruction and impeding?

Fiona Mactaggart: It would, and the point my hon. Friend raises relates to the biggest gap in the law. There is no offence involving protection from being impeded or obstructed available to ambulance workers, and he has given a particularly gross example of impeding and obstructing. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his generous offer to ensure that the Bill could provide us with an opportunity to deal with that lacuna in the law, but I think I owe an explanation to hon. Members on both sides of the House who have asked how I can ensure that the seriousness of assaults on emergency services workers can properly be reflected through the sentencing guidelines procedure.

The Sentencing Advisory Panel has already started the consultation on draft guidelines covering sentencing for all violent crimes against the person, so, as I have already said, we are in the middle of that process. Sentencing guidelines will be issued in due course, following the consultation and consideration by the council. We expect them to reiterate that the victim being a public servant is a serious aggravating factor in any offence of violence and to explain that attacks on any victim who is serving the public can have a serious impact on the ability to deliver the public service. In this example, that specifically increases the seriousness of the offence.

Nia Griffith: Is my hon. Friend aware of how much support there is out there among the public for ensuring that we send a clear message that any form of assault or violent crime is unacceptable? Only recently in my constituency, 2,000 signatures were collected, asking for an increase in a sentence felt to be too lenient for, in this instance, deliberate manslaughter. I beg her to look carefully at sentencing for violent crimes, which is such an emotive issue in the public eye. It is important that we say clearly that no civilised society can ever tolerate any form of assault or violence against the person.

Fiona Mactaggart: My hon. Friend is right. That is one reason for this Government introducing powers to appeal against unduly lenient sentences, which were not previously available to the prosecution. That is an important way to build public confidence in our legal system.

I assure the House that we will work with the Sentencing Guidelines Council to ensure that, in formulating the relevant aggravating factors for offences of violence, the council is aware, specifically, of the harm that an attack on an emergency worker can do, and that in responding to an emergency, even a short delay can endanger the lives of emergency workers and specifically endanger also the lives of the people to whom they are responding—there may be only a few minutes in which to reach them. We will ensure that the Sentencing Guidelines Council is aware of the suggestion made many times in this debate—I am inclined to send it a copy of Hansard—that the guidelines should mention that specifically.

Let us be clear. If a sentencer intends to depart from a sentencing guideline, they must explain in open court why they are not taking that factor into account. This is not merely something that exists in a bench book—it is clear guidance that a sentencer needs to implement. If the specific nature of an emergency worker responding to an emergency is included as a particularly aggravating factor in the guidelines on violent crime—we want to encourage the Sentencing Guidelines Council to do that—the sentencer must reflect that aggravation in the sentence that they hand down. If they do not intend to do so, they need to explain why in court. I do not believe that all hon. Members were aware that the process works as specifically as that, and I think that they will be reassured. We all want to achieve the aim that sentencing properly reflects the seriousness of this matter.

Mrs. Hodgson: On that point, will the guidelines include a mandatory minimum sentence for assaults on emergency workers involving knives?

Fiona Mactaggart: We have some powerful minimum sentences and specific legislation for knife use. Those underpin the additional aggravating factors. The powers on knife crime apply to all people, but when the sentence is handed down the fact that the person involved was serving the public would be an additional factor. If we can persuade the Sentencing Guidelines Council to ensure that the specific circumstances of an emergency service worker are reflected, that factor could also be taken into account.

Richard Younger-Ross: I am trying to be helpful. What the Minister has just said is reassuring. However, I have still not heard enough about why an aggravated offence does not work, and why she is taking this line of argument. Rather than prolong this debate and that point, however, will she agree to meet me and the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) before the Committee stage—I hope that we get that far—to go through that argument? It is our intention to help the Government introduce this legislation, but we wish to test those arguments.

Fiona Mactaggart: We can do that in Committee, and I am happy to discuss the matter with the hon. Gentlemen. Having set up the Sentencing Guidelines Council, we should use it as effectively as we can, and I am happy to discuss with them how it works. It is a relatively new animal, and not everyone is completely familiar with it. In my view, the experience of the offence under the Fire and Rescue Services Act 2004 is significant. It is interesting that this debate has focused on the fire services, which currently have an offence that is quite complex and has recently been reiterated in law. There have been difficulties, however, in securing effective prosecutions. Part of the reason for that is the difficulty of demonstrating what constitutes an offence of this kind. We need a fairly simple definition of the offence, while also ensuring that it can be dealt with by means of a sentence.

Jim Dowd: Much has been made of sentencing—rightly—but if a conviction is not gained first, all the sentencing guidelines in the world will not make a blind bit of difference. During her discussions with my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) in Committee, my hon. Friend must ensure that one of the Bill's purposes is to make convictions as easy as possible to secure, consistent with the burden of proof and standards of evidence.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is there anything that you can do to protect the House and the Minister from the instruction that the Whip has just handed the Minister, very visibly? I fear that the Minister may have been told to sit down quickly, in which case she will not have an opportunity to answer Members' questions amply enough. Can you do anything to protect the Minister from harassment by her own Whip?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Absolutely nothing.

Fiona Mactaggart: The Minister does not require the assistance or protection of the Chair. I can inform the House that the note passed to me was drawing my attention to the fact that my hon. Friend was trying to intervene, because I had not noticed. I shall be happy to pass the note to the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Forth: It will be in code.

Fiona Mactaggart: The right hon. Gentleman is one of the great conspiracy theorists of the House, but to suggest that "Take Jim Dowd" is code for "Hurry up and sit down" is pretty ridiculous.

My hon. Friend made an important point. We all agree that we want convictions for these offences, but the Government see two potential barriers. One relates to determination to proceed, on which action is being taken. The NHS security authority is one example. I am happy to give a commitment to the House; I have already spoken to the Attorney-General about the possibility of improving guidance to the Crown Prosecution Service.

The other barrier is the fact that proving the offence is being made more complicated. We have the opportunity to create a very simple offence of impeding. What we do not want is a series of narrow, specific offences involving aggravating factors, which will merely mean that more must be proved in court. We need a simple, straightforward definition. We all oppose assaults, whoever the victim may be. We all agree, however, that an assault on an emergency worker has a particular quality, which we want sentences to reflect. We do not want to have to prove more; we want an assault to be an assault to be an assault. Assaults on emergency workers nevertheless have that special quality.

I am finding it difficult to persuade the House of my view, but I hope that I shall be able to do so. It is an important point of principle that it is best to provide adequate guidelines on sentencing, rather than increasing the number of facts that the prosecution must prove in order to secure a conviction. The more factors that are added to the law, the more barriers the prosecution must hop over. It should be a straightforward process that an assault leads to conviction, but an assault in the circumstances specified in the Bill should have more serious consequences than an assault in other circumstances. However, we should not put extra burdens on the prosecution by adding to the things that it has to prove: the presence of an aggravating factor and other particular circumstances. I feel strongly about the matter. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his generosity in agreeing that we should focus on the big gap that exists and use the tools that we already have to deal with serious assault.

It was not possible to do that in Scotland. The reason is that Scotland does not have the Sentencing Guidelines Council. Scotland had to create specific offences. It has slightly different sentencing mechanisms. The way that our sentencing system is constructed means that the nine-month sentence is not available. We are trying to create simple, straightforward law—I am glad to have the endorsement of the right hon. Gentleman, who said that it is quite a good thing to try to be simple and straightforward—and to ensure that the seriousness of this particular offence is taken into account.

I hope that we can achieve consensus across the House. I think that we agree on the outcome that we want. I am prepared to spend time following this debate to explain and to discuss with Opposition Members the way in which the Sentencing Guidelines Council is capable of operating and the powers that it has, so that we can agree that that part of the Bill is not essential.

However, there is a part of the Bill that is essential. That is the measure to deal with obstructing or impeding an emergency service worker who is responding to an emergency. There are already offences of obstruction, just as there of assault, but they do not cover everyone or every activity; it is not necessary. I have referred to the firefighters offence. There is also a police officers offence, but there is no offence that covers obstruction of other emergency workers such as ambulance workers or members of the coastguard, who deal with emergencies offshore. We have identified that as a gap in the legislation that covers emergency workers. It is the only gap that we have identified. Other matters can be dealt with within the framework of existing legislation.

If hon. Members look at the respect action plan, they will see that we specifically identified the possible need for an offence of obstructing an ambulance worker. We said that we would consider introducing such an offence, so we specifically welcome that part of the Bill. We believe that it would be a step in the right direction to ensure that deliberately obstructing an ambulance worker is an offence. As I have outlined, the offence of obstructing a firefighter is not as simple and clear as it could be, so we think that making it simpler and easier to use would be an improvement. Therefore, the Bill has something to offer. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for introducing it. I was glad that he said that he will table amendments in Committee to ensure that the issue of obstructing emergency workers responding to an emergency can become the core of the Bill. There are real benefits to be gained from that.

In addition to such an offence, we need to recognise that there is more to do. As well as having an offence of obstructing an emergency worker in responding to an emergency, we need to try to prevent that offence from occurring. We need to ensure that behaviour that often begins with exuberance and high spirits does not escalate into obstruction and violence. As we have heard during the debate, that has often happened.

Barbara Keeley: I am glad that my hon. Friend has come on to that point. Although it has been helpful to hear all that she has said about sentencing, at that stage an offence has been committed. It is important that we look also at prevention. I hope that she is coming to that. A number of hon. Members, me included, touched on the respect agenda. Perhaps she can say how we can send a strong message about the unacceptability of assaults or impeding emergency workers. That is important to the emergency workers involved.

Fiona Mactaggart: Yes, my hon. Friend is absolutely right. I have been struck by the fact that the fire service has welcomed not only the agreement that my right hon. Friend and I have reached as regards how to proceed with the Bill, but the elements of the respect action plan that are about dealing with the growing problem of antisocial behaviour, which can blight areas and make life very difficult for some people. The respect action plan sets out our goals and reiterates the need to tackle antisocial behaviour by dealing with disrespect in every walk of life. Tackling disrespect in general can often have a specific effect in a particular area. We need to focus not only on disrespect towards emergency workers but general issues such as school discipline and attendance. We must involve schools and parents in tackling disrespectful behaviour that results from truancy and inadequate supervision of excluded children.

We want to ensure that young people have an opportunity to make a positive impact on society. They might do things such as creating traps because they want adventure and to do bold and brave things. They do not usually have those opportunities, so they take these very antisocial measures. We as Government, and all of us, need to ensure that there are constructive, challenging activities for young people, with appropriate opportunities to get involved in sport or volunteering, for example, so that they feel that they can have an impact on society in a positive way, not by being destructive.

Mr. Bailey: I wholeheartedly and enthusiastically endorse the Minister's comments. Is the Home Office having discussions with public services to see how they could stimulate that sort of participation, and if not, will it?

Fiona Mactaggart: Yes, we are having discussions with a lot of people about the respect agenda. I have mentioned schools and parents. We must ensure that we help to support families who are in difficulty. The respect action plan establishes projects to work intensively with the most problematic families. The hon. Member for Upminster highlighted the role that parents have to play. Respect must be promoted right across Government. We must look at how every programme and funding or inspection regime contributes to dealing with the problem. Neighbourhoods must get the power to ensure that local services deal quickly and effectively with disrespectful behaviour by a minority—for example, by cleaning up graffiti. We must have speedy, visible reparative justice through measures that extend the powers available to deal with crime and antisocial behaviour by getting young people involved in sorting out the problems that they create.

The respect agenda is not only about the public services but about the public realm. My hon. Friend the Member for Worsley referred to the Manchester Evening News campaign. The media are an important part of the public realm. I applaud the protect our heroes campaign, which is promoting the respect agenda by highlighting destructive behaviour toward Manchester's firefighters. Through that campaign, the Manchester Evening News has done a substantial amount to help make the city's firefighters safer.

We should recognise that fire and rescue services have already introduced measures to tackle attacks on firefighters. We have spoken to them about this issue and they have been encouraged to report incidents, so that the police and prosecuting authorities can make prosecutions where appropriate. Her Majesty's fire service inspectorate requires fire and rescue services to complete a monthly return on the number of assaults, so that the figures can accurately reflect the problem on the ground. Members have indeed pointed out that we need better statistics to drive effective action. Fire and rescue services are also introducing measures such as video cameras in cabs of appliances in order to help identify offenders.

Andrew Stunell: I appreciate the Minister's giving way on the under-recording of offences, which is a matter of great concern to firefighters in my constituency, who are members of the Greater Manchester fire and rescue service. In what way will such initiatives produce practical benefits for firefighters in my constituency?

Fiona Mactaggart: Officials at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister are working with the Association of Chief Police Officers to support the development of a memorandum of understanding between the fire and rescue services and ACPO, in order to develop a better working relationship between the two services, thereby leading to the more effective pursuit of prosecutions against those who would obstruct or assault firefighters. Such discussions are under way, so as well as improved reporting and the collecting of evidence through, for example, installing videos in cabs, ACPO and the fire and rescue services are working together on that memorandum of understanding.

In addition, the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association has set up a "task and finish" group—the language used in such services sometimes differs from that used by others—which is being led by assistant chief fire officer Alan Richardson of the South Wales fire and rescue service. The group's task is to look at all matters relating to assaults on firefighters, with a view to making recommendations and promulgating best practice; it will report in April. Such measures and the better co-ordination of police and fire services will play a very important role in increasing the number of prosecutions and in improving the safety of our fire services.

Returning to young people and the respect agenda, we need to recognise that although young people can be responsible for thoughtless behaviour and do not always consider the consequences of their actions, they might not be able to pay a fine, which is the proposed penalty in such circumstances. I assure the House that we will also consider greater use of the early interventions now available to us, such as acceptable behaviour contracts and, where appropriate, parenting contracts and orders. A parenting order is available when, for example, a conviction has been secured in a court. So if one secures a conviction for obstruction in respect of a minor, who might not be able to pay a fine, one could attach to that a parenting order as part of the sentence.

We are also willing to use antisocial behaviour orders for all age groups to stop antisocial and potentially dangerous behaviour before it escalates. We will work to ensure that those measures are used consistently [redacted] we send a clear message about the serious nature [redacted] behaviour when aimed at emergency workers. My [redacted] Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Emily Thornberry) described estates in her constituency where a culture had developed of entrapping and targeting firefighters. ASBOs and other orders can be more effective in areas where such a culture has developed to nip such behaviour in the bud and prevent inappropriate obstruction of the work of the emergency services from escalating into violence and assault.

We also need to encourage the courts to make greater use of community penalties where appropriate. For example, young people involved in incidents against members of the fire and rescue service might be required to become involved in the brigade's youth schemes, as hon. Members have mentioned. The Government encourage effective local partnerships of that sort, which can enable requirements of community sentences to be carried out by children and young people. There are a number of excellent schemes involving fire services across England and Wales, the aim of which is to help young offenders to understand the harm they have caused. There are similar schemes involving health workers. Workers in those services can be the most powerful advocates, because they can describe the possible consequences of that antisocial behaviour much more impressively and with greater intensity than a more formal court process. We need to make the most of that when tackling this issue in relation to young people. We also need to ensure that local youth offending teams, as well as fire brigades and health services, are aware of the good practices that have worked well in other areas. Expertise that has been built up around the country must be shared to encourage the adoption and adaptation of good practices in whatever way is best for an area.

We also need to encourage the police and the Crown Prosecution Service to adopt a more active policy on investigating and prosecuting incidents. Many hon. Members have pointed out that the health service has already made significant progress in that area and shown what can be done, especially with regard to incidents occurring within the hospital setting. However, with the emergency services, such offences can happen anywhere, and that can pose greater challenges. Nevertheless, placing our focus on the issue can produce significant results. I am glad that the health service and the fire and rescue service are looking at options, too.

I assure the House that I will actively encourage the emerging agreements and do whatever else I can to ensure that the CPS and the courts are aware of how dangerous incidents that involve the emergency services can be. As I have said, strong guidelines have been issued by the Sentencing Guidelines Council to ensure that the fact that a victim of an assault was serving the public at the time is regarded as a substantial aggravating factor.

Mrs. Hodgson: Will my hon. Friend clarify whether the umbrella definition of emergency workers will include nurses and staff, such as porters, in accident and emergency and other hospital departments?

Fiona Mactaggart: Our aim is to try to construct a simple offence. I have described at length the difficulty if an offence is complicated; for example, where we say, "These people are in but those people are out." In Committee, I hope that we can amend the obstruction provisions so that an emergency service worker responding to an emergency will be covered by the obstruction offence. That is where there is a big gap. A nurse accompanying an emergency team would certainly be covered, but the offence would not be designed for circumstances inside a hospital where it is much easier to control the situation. However, we can examine that point in Committee.

People who go to emergencies to protect us are extremely vulnerable, as Members have made clear. That vulnerability is what we want to deal with; those workers are vulnerable to obstruction and the consequences of obstructing them can be serious. The resources available to workers attending an emergency are not as substantial as those for people treating patients in a hospital; for example, there may be security staff, although it is of course a great pity that most of our A and E departments require security staff. Teams responding to an emergency are very vulnerable and obstruction of them can have serious and substantial consequences. That is the main thing we have to deal with and I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for allowing us to use the Bill to protect people against that obstruction.

The Manchester Evening News campaign and other campaigns across the country show that there is a huge public appetite for dealing with the situation.

Ann Keen: Does my hon. Friend agree that the Bill will also send a message to the relatives of the work force—our heroes? Families know that when someone leaves for work they may be in a very vulnerable position. We are really saying thank you to the family members of emergency services personnel.

Fiona Mactaggart: Absolutely. It is a complete outrage that people who serve the public should be subject to the type of behaviour that has been described in the House today. I shall be proud to work with my right hon. Friend and, I hope, with Members on both sides of the House to make sure that our emergency workers are safer in future.

If we are clear about making a real difference where there is that gap in the law, if we do not over-complicate the issue and if we work with the tools that are already available, we can make those heroes—who save lives and on whom our society depends—safer. If we achieve that, we should all feel proud.

My speech has roamed far, partly because I wanted to be generous about taking interventions, for a particular reason. I hope that we can gain the consent of Members on both sides of the House to enable the Bill to deal with a gap in the law.

Our debate has highlighted the increasing and tragic dangers faced by our emergency workers, but we will do them no favours if we create a law that raises expectations but achieves little in practice because it is flawed. Let us be honest: that has happened before. The Government cannot therefore support the additional, not necessary, offence of assault. The law already exists to pursue a range of assault offences, and to create specific offences would make for complicated law, which risks having unintended consequences. Sentencing guidelines ensure that the courts must hand out tougher sentences for those whose victims are serving the public.

I have outlined the non-legislative measures whereby we can deal with these offences and, we hope, prevent them from happening in the first place. However, there is a gap in the law in relation to obstructing an emergency worker. There is no offence of obstruction in relation to ambulance workers, and I have been able to show the House that the present offence in relation to firefighters does not work as well as we would wish. I am therefore glad that my right hon. Friend has agreed that he will introduce amendments to deal with this issue in Committee and I look forward to working in Committee with him, and with Members across the House, to bring back on Report a Bill that deals with less but deals with it well. When we come to do that, we can all feel very proud of ourselves indeed and we can ensure that those people, those heroes, upon whom we depend for our lives, will be safer in future.

I am pleased to support the Bill.

Mr. Alan Williams: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall make a few brief comments. First, I thank everyone who took part in this morning's debate for the very positive way in which it was conducted. I hope and believe that a clear message will go out from the speeches that, regardless of party, in all parts of the House there is enormous respect and regard for our emergency services, and a determination that they shall get the protection they need.

Secondly, it has been worth being here to be a witness to the most unexpected marriage of minds between the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and the Minister. I advise her not to be dazzled by his charismatic style; he can be a fickle fellow, and I must tell her that I am not optimistic for the survival of the relationship.

I thank the Minister for trying to meet my concerns. I will read in detail what she has said and we shall liaise between now and Committee to work out appropriate amendments to achieve what the House obviously wants.

I thank the sponsors of the Bill, particularly the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Richard Younger-Ross), who provided me with the original idea arising from the Scottish Bill, and my hon. Friends the Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Emily Thornberry) and for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), who made up for my legal inadequacies by joining me at consultations with Ministers and explaining to me what they were talking about.

It is not often that we in the House praise the press, but the Manchester Evening News has been ahead of all the press in this country in campaigning for months, absolutely consistently, in support of the emergency workers. I want the newspaper to know that that is recognised in the House. Other hon. Members have said the same.

Finally, there is one person to whom I want to pay particular tribute—Barry Dixon of the Manchester fire service, who, on behalf of all the emergency services, led not only in briefing me but in supporting me as I worked on the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and committed to a Standing Committee, pursuant to Standing Order No. 63 (Committal of Bills).

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Today's Order Paper says that there are four written ministerial statements. I understand that three of them have already made their way to the Library, but the fourth—probably the most important of the four—on police force restructuring has yet to do so. May I seek your guidance on the reason for any delay?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): I understand that that statement is due to be put before the House today. I have no knowledge about when it will be produced, but it should be before the House today, and I trust that that will be the case.

Telecommunications Masts (Planning Control) Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

12.50 pm

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Slough (Fiona Mactaggart), who is just leaving the Chamber, said of the Emergency Workers (Protection) Bill, which we have just debated—at a length that occasionally made me feel that curling offered unexpected excitements, after watching it during the Olympic games—that she did not like the Bill and it was unnecessary, but none the less she was willing to discuss it in Committee, because she thought that it could be a vehicle to make some useful amendments to the law.

I hope that the Minister who will deal with this Bill and I can negotiate on exactly the same basis. I expect him not to endorse my Bill, but to acknowledge that there are some serious difficulties with the way in which the system operates now. Therefore, let us find a means to discuss that together, so that people can feel that a transparent process is taking place, which will lead to the calming of some people's fears and passions.

Emily Thornberry (Islington, South and Finsbury) (Lab): There is huge support for the right hon. Gentleman's Bill from all sorts of quarters. A large number of my constituents believe that they are affected by such masts, and they certainly want the law to be changed to protect schoolchildren. So I have come here to support his Bill.

Mr. Curry: I am very grateful indeed to the hon. Lady for her support. There is huge concern throughout the country, and my view is very simple: when there is concern, the job of politicians is to try to find ways to deal with it. I hope that I have found a pragmatic way to deal with that concern.

The Bill is something of an old favourite. I plead guilty to what could be called parliamentary plagiarism: I am the third of the lone parents who have introduced such a Bill in succession. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for West Suffolk (Mr. Spring) and the hon. Member for Hazel Grove (Andrew Stunell) for beating the path along this road.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (North-East Hampshire) (Con): My right hon. Friend would be wrong to describe himself as a lone parent. This is more like the Child Support Agency: the Bill has more parents than one could possibly imagine. There is much support in the House for the Bill, so can we hope that the Minister will not talk it out?

Mr. Curry: I share that thought, although I have some caution about the analogy with the CSA, given its productivity and the Government's view of it, which is rather generally shared by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West) (Lab): Reference has been made to three attempts to introduce such a Bill, but I point out to the right hon. Gentleman and other colleagues that there has been a wide variety of Bills on issues relating to phone masts. I introduced one myself—it was not the same as this Bill—in an attempt to place on a statutory basis the Mobile Operators Association's code of conduct. I have reservations about parts of the Bill, but even if not through the opportunity that he is offering, the Government need to take a detailed look at the concerns about how the mobile network operators currently go about getting their planning permissions.

Mr. Curry: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention, and I agree with what he says. In referring merely to what one might describe as the Bill's direct line of descent, I would not wish to exclude all its relatives.

The concern has not abated; it has increased. I could bring pantechnicons full of letters, petitions and submissions into the Chamber. Of course there will be a quota of cranks and obsessives, but a large proportion of the concern is being expressed by normal responsible citizens. There are two ways of dealing with that: by saying that the concern is uninformed, unjustified, unreasonable and plain wrong, or by saying, as politicians, that irrespective of the intrinsic validity of people's concerns, there is a problem to be dealt with and everyone benefits from our dealing with it. I have introduced such a Bill again, simply because the problem still exists.

I think that the Government share that point of view. Yesterday, by a happy coincidence, they published their review of the consultation procedures that are being carried out by the University of Reading and Arup. I read it in as much detail as I could in the time that I had, and it is a clear, concise document that expresses the concerns well. The industry shares my point of view. I met the Mobile Operators Association yesterday, and it said that there was more that the Government and industry could do. We have achieved a consensus in understanding that there is a problem to be addressed, which is the first step towards a consensual approach.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that one of the problems that we have had up until now is that many people who have raised concerns have felt patronised, to an extent by the mobile service providers and also, at a previous stage, by the Government? I held a one-day conference on the matter last year. In fairness, I must add that there were representatives from all the groups involved and the dialogue began to make meaningful progress, as had not happened before.

Mr. Curry: The paternity claims for these measures are spreading so rapidly that we will have to have some DNA testing at the end of the day. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that people are seriously concerned that the consultation procedure is not substantive, and that what they say makes no difference. I will talk about that in a little while.

My Bill is an invitation to the industry and the Government to engage in discussion and find a better planning and consultation framework. My proposals are not prescriptive, but an invitation to negotiate. I have been a Member long enough to know that the chance of Back Benchers producing Bills that meet all legislative requirements is quite small. After all, the Government cannot do that in their own Bills and it takes a great deal of amendment to get them right. This Bill would undoubtedly be little different.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I support the principles behind the Bill, although I think that the right hon. Gentleman has made it a little complex, and the problem could be dealt with rather more simply. I am particularly concerned about 3G upgrades, because no planning consent is required to upgrade existing masts. Will the Bill deal with that? Although the right hon. Gentleman claims that there is great support for his Bill among Conservative Members, I am concerned that few of them seem to be present to back him up. If there is a vote on Second Reading, has he got enough support to carry it?

Mr. Curry: If no one decided to divide the House—I have not yet found anybody who says that they are hostile to the Bill—it would be immaterial how many hon. Members were present, as with the Emergency Workers (Protection) Bill. I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will persuade the Minister to envisage precisely those circumstances. I know that he is an aficionado of Friday sittings and I welcome his interventions—although, knowing a little about his track record, I should say that the briefer they are, the more I shall welcome them.

Susan Kramer (Richmond Park) (LD): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that if mobile phone companies were to come to the community early to outline their needs and plans for the next few years, the community could help to identify appropriate sites? In my community, local residents negotiated with Kew gardens to have a site identified in the gardens for all mobile phone masts in the area. That was done only after direct action that included planting palm trees in locations where masts had been planned. Those palm trees are still there, but the mobile phone companies are happy to have their masts in the campanile. However, there is no methodology for ensuring that that approach has been captured for use in the future.

Mr. Curry: I have seen some amazing sights, including masts disguised as trees representing extremely rare flora from Latin America. I agree with the hon. Lady, but I would add merely that local authorities have a responsibility too. They should have proper planning frameworks and designate people to talk to the mobile phone companies. Those people should be willing to engage in dialogue, as should local councillors. Too often councillors wait until planning applications are received, and are not alert enough during the consultation process. There is an improvement to be made across the piece.

Kitty Usher (Burnley) (Lab): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree with the organisation Together Against Masts in Burnley and me that, for the very reason that he gives, it is essential to revoke the provisions on permitted development rights? Unless we do that, the public simply will not know where the masts are likely to be located.

Mr. Curry: My Bill does not propose to revoke permitted development rights in quite as brutal a way as the hon. Lady mentions. What is important is that people should know what is happening and have a proper opportunity to make representations. When they make representations, they should be listened to. The range of considerations that a local authority takes into account should be broader than at present. There is currently a bias in the system against a local authority objecting, for reasons with which we will probably all be familiar.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): The right hon. Gentleman prays in aid local authorities, but does he accept that a number of them have made representations to the Government asking for a review of primary legislation?

Mr. Curry: I do accept that. Indeed, I have the representations; I have a large file dedicated to representations from local planning authorities. The representations have come from across the piece—from lobby groups, individuals, organisations and local planning authorities.

Janet Anderson (Rossendale and Darwen) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman clarify one point about permitted development rights? I understand that his Bill would revoke those rights in respect of antennae, which include satellite dishes. He will know that such rights have recently been amended to reflect changes in technology and support the demand for access to digital TV and broadband. Would not some provisions in his Bill make it more difficult for people to access those digital services?

Mr. Curry: The intention of my Bill is not to hamper or burden the industry or make it less able to operate, but to try to find a mechanism whereby it can operate with the consent of the people among whom it is necessarily implanted. That is why Committee stages are valuable; they enable us to tease out unexpected or unintended consequences, and also to reinforce consequences that are intended—another reason to grant the Bill its Second Reading.

When the planning framework was put in place in the 1990s and the mobile phone industry was in its fledgling form, there was a natural concern to nurture it. The industry has been nurtured well enough to provide a quite astonishing amount of money for the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it has moved on. I suppose that it is now iconic; it is almost a new-age industry. It is not just an industry, but almost a culture as well. Its very pervasiveness has what has made it necessarily a much more political industry—a phrase I use with a small "p".

It is estimated that there are some 50,000 base stations in the country. One cannot get the precise figures from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, but one can see the number of non-domestic hereditaments shown in the rating list, which I happen to have discovered following an assiduous search. On 31 March last year, which is almost exactly a year ago, there were 20,930 hereditaments, and I have a list that breaks down among local authority districts the number of installations in existence. Of course, some districts have more than 300 installations.

To understand why there is concern, we must have what le guide Michelin calls "un peu d'histoire"—a little retrospective look at the situation. There are four broad categories of mobile phone installation. I immediately declare to the Minister that in the hierarchy of anoraks, I am an extraordinarily long way from the top and very close to the bottom, so I shall not speak in extremely technical detail.

First, ground-based masts of more than 15 m in height get the full planning permission. Secondly, at the opposite end of the scale, the very small boxes—I think that they are called pico boxes—that are often masked by shop signs could well be sited every 50 m along a main road. They are governed by de minimis rules. One up from that, we have small base stations, which are up to 4 m high and might sit on top of buildings. They come under the permitted development rules. No planning permission is required but there is a range of consultation processes, depending on the site.

The most sensitive category of mast, on which much of the argument focuses, is the ground-based mast up to 15 m high. Those masts are governed by a voluntary code, under which the site is rated. It is known as the traffic light method. Sites are rated red, amber or green and the rating triggers a specific consultation process.

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is perplexing that grading is done by the company that wants to install the mast? Would not it make sense for an independent assessor to do it?

Mr. Curry: One of the concerns about the consultation process is the lack of an arbitrator or referee. Indeed, the review of the consultation procedures that the Under-Secretary has conducted suggests that there is a case for instituting an arbiter. That would cover my hon. Friend's point.

It may not be in the operator's interest to have a system of red, amber and green, because red suggests some sort of danger to most people, whereas the ratings relate to the appropriateness of the site rather than carrying a medical connotation. Perhaps it would be in everybody's interest to move to something more appropriate to the process.

Jim Dowd: The role of an arbiter or third party in assessing a site would be irrelevant, because the code of conduct has no legal force. It makes not an iota of difference whether operators choose to abide by it.

Mr. Curry: That is a good point, and I agree with the hon. Gentleman. The point is also made in the Under-Secretary's review. There would be no point in having an arbiter if there were no rules whereby he reached his judgment. There is a problem.

Lorely Burt (Solihull) (LD): My constituents feel strongly about the issue. Many of them believe that red, green and amber relate to the amount of upset that the siting of a specific mast is likely to cause in the local community. I should be grateful if the right hon. Gentleman commented on that.

Mr. Curry: I merely repeat what I just said: the system is not intended to denote upset, but it is generally assumed to do that. I shall be brief, because I believe that the hon. Lady is the promoter of the next Bill. Her intervention was therefore a heroic act of self-sacrifice—but we have all sacrificed a lot today already.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I am the promoter of the next Bill but one, but I would still like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question. Does he agree that one unfortunate side effect of the grading system is that the same sites receive applications for more and more masts, so there is a concentration in a small area, which leads to fears and rumours—one never knows whether evidence will follow one day—about clusters of cancer cases?

Mr. Curry: I accept that, and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the diversity of his interests. He can move from telephone masts to breastfeeding in one sitting.

The local authority has eight weeks to object to a mast, subject to the traffic light system. The most frequent ground for objection is amenity, because health issues are not normally considered to be a valid ground. There are weaknesses in the procedure. As we all know, local authorities are often reluctant to refuse planning applications if they believe that they will end up going through an appeal procedure, simply because of the costs of an appeal. There are problems with the timing and relevance of the consultation. People feel that they are not heard, or that if they are heard, no account is taken of their views. There is no confidence in the traffic light system and, as the hon. Member for Lewisham, West (Jim Dowd) said, any arbiter would have no basis on which to make a judgment because compliance is voluntary.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): One of the concerns expressed to me by my constituents is that not only must they be vigilant about applications, but when one application is refused, another operator makes an application for the same site. My constituents consider that unfair, and even though the council may refuse the application, they feel strongly about the vigilance and time needed, and the unfairness.

Mr. Curry: I entirely agree. That is one of the major concerns that has been expressed. Of course, the concerns tend to focus on masts sited near schools and medical facilities.

Mr. Jeremy Hunt (South-West Surrey) (Con): I had a case in which Orange wanted to site a mast right outside a school in Farnham. Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the problems with the current legislative framework is that it allows operators to be extremely arrogant in their dealings with local residents? In that case, the response from Orange was, "If you don't want the mast outside your school, that's fine. Can you find us somewhere else to put it?" It is inappropriate for a mobile phone operator to be able to say such a thing. Does my right hon. Friend agree that we need to address that?

Mr. Curry: Indeed. Even where operators are required to issue a consultation—for example, to heads and governors of schools if they want to site a mast within range of a school—there is no control over the timing, so the consultation document can arrive on the day that the school packs up for the summer holidays, and by the time school starts again, the consultation period is almost over. Again, that is a loophole that sensible measures could put right.

I accept that there is no present evidence of harm. Sir William Stewart's report in 2001, which was updated in 2004, spells that out, but I have been around long enough to know that politicians and scientists can offer only current evidence. They do not deal in certainties or guarantees. The public increasingly ask for certainty and guarantees, and risk is a much more difficult political issue now than it was a generation ago. Having been at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food during the BSE crisis, I am familiar with the way in which that may work out in practice.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Is this not a key point? The fact that there is no current evidence of harm does not mean that there is evidence of no harm. That is a very different issue, and we surely need to follow the precautionary principle, as the Stewart report suggests.

Mr. Curry: It is crucial that we understand what the Stewart report recommended. I have taken from the website—a technological feat in its own right, as far as I am concerned—the summary of the Stewart report from the National Radiological Protection Board. It recommends, for example, that > "particular attention be given to how best to minimise exposure of potentially vulnerable sub-groups such as children and to consider the possibility that there may be other sub-groups who may be particularly sensitive to radiowaves" and calls for a continuing programme of research.

I recognise that Sir William Stewart's report was on a much wider subject than masts, but he stated:

> "The fact is that the widespread use of mobile phones is a relatively recent phenomenon and it is possible that adverse health effects could emerge after years of prolonged use. The evidence base necessary to allow us to make firm judgements has not yet been accumulated. What we can say is that there is as yet no hard evidence of adverse health effects on the general public, but because of the current uncertainties we recommend a continued precautionary approach to the use of mobile phone technologies. This approach should be adopted by all involved in this area—including government, the mobile phone industry and all who choose to purchase a mobile phone for themselves, or their family, or their children".

What he is saying, which is entirely sensible, is that a case cannot be stacked up on health grounds, but sane people realise that that situation may not be permanent and we should build into our provision the possibility that that advice may change.

Mr. John Horam (Orpington) (Con): Is my right hon. Friend aware, given his European interests, that there has been research in both Germany and Sweden relevant to this matter, which shows instances giving rise to concern?

Mr. Curry: I am aware of that, which is why the evidence is a moving phenomenon, not fixed. That is why, as my right hon. Friend the Member for North-East Hampshire (Mr. Arbuthnot)—one of the large delegation from Hampshire present today—said, the precautionary principle is the right one to apply. The Government are constantly applying the precautionary principle in a range of areas—in, for example, bioengineering plant and food technology, at both the European and the national level.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): My right hon. Friend is making a powerful case for his Bill. Will he confirm that the regime he is promoting for England is already up and running in other parts of the UK, such as Scotland and Northern Ireland? The infant that he seeks to produce for England is already an active toddler elsewhere.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend has taken the words out of my mouth, and it is perfectly possible to reform or modernise the rules without either the intention or the consequence of damaging the industry. Scotland requires full planning permission for the ground-based masts under 15 m, and there is a debate in Wales on which way to go. Indeed, in July 2004 the Scottish Executive commissioned from the university of Dundee a study entitled "Evaluation of Revised Planning Controls Over Telecommunications Development" on the consequences of the changes in Scotland.

I shall not quote from that study, but it states that the strengthening of the planning rules has been no impediment to the mobile phone operators, nor has it caused a burden for Scottish councils that they have not been able to discharge. It is right that within the quasi-federal system in the UK, different policies are being applied in all manner of regions across the country.

The Bill has three core provisions, which are familiar and inherited from the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Hazel Grove. That, I think, was put together with a great deal of help from the technical expertise available in the House. The provisions are the precautionary principle, which must accompany the planning applications; the identification of the area and the range of the beam of the greatest intensity, as well as the characteristics of that beam, which then become part of the planning consideration; and the ability of local authorities to remove masts on land used for medical or educational purposes without compensation.

I repeat to the Minister that the Bill represents an invitation to negotiate and engage. We have a common interest in putting to rest vexations and persistent grievances. I know he will agree that we need a process of identification and analysis, followed by the addressing of the issues before us. His consultation document has started that process.

The Minister could stand up and say, "We've got it under control. We've had the consultation and the document has been published. We envisage new guidance and we'll consult on that. Then we will have dealt with the issue." I would say that there is a deep suspicion over this, which is not healthy. We need to proceed in such a transparent way that the industry feels its future is secure, and the constant local guerrilla wars no longer have to be fought. The public must not feel threatened, intimidated or taken advantage of. Local authorities must not feel overburdened.

The best way to achieve all that is through the traditional procedure of taking the Bill into Committee and being open in the negotiations, to try to achieve what the Minister and I both want. At the end of the day, he and I will have a great deal less traffic from my constituents about concerns that I know are very real to them. Also, the industry will not feel that it is guilty of some local trespass all the time.

Mr. Jim McGovern (Dundee, West) (Lab): I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is a member of the all-party group on mobile communications, but I understand that the Bill is largely the result of a report from that group. I further understand that the group was criticised in the press last week as being misused by lobbying organisations. Does he share my fear that the concerns he has outlined, which are shared by all our constituents, are being misused by organisations that simply want to promote alternative forms of communication?

Mr. Curry: That may or may not be the case. I do not belong to the group; I feared that there might be a technical entry qualification, which I would be bound to fail, so I stood outside it.

My concern is simply that we should sort out the problem in a way that lets everybody see that it has been sorted out—clearly and openly. We would all be a great deal more comfortable as a result, whether we are trying to make the industry work or whether we want to feel that our home is not being threatened in any way. Colleagues across the House would then increasingly feel able to concentrate on the easy issues in their constituency burden, such as the future of the Child Support Agency or the Government's tax credits system, which are already taking up a great deal of our time. In that spirit, I commend this measure to the House.

1.19 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) on introducing his Bill. He will be pleased to hear that I support it, so I do not intend to speak at great length. I want to find out about one or two points, however, because this subject is a major issue in my constituency.

I have been checking my records, and I see that in the past 12 months, in one ward in my constituency, Mill Hill, and in its immediate neighbouring planning districts, there have been 14 different applications and issues relating to mobile phone masts. Orange is probably the main culprit, closely followed by T-Mobile and Vodafone. They seem to try to wear down communities and their opposition—and local authority planning departments—through repeat applications and continuing appeals. Something must be done about it. There was even an application for a mobile phone mast to go on top of Barnet hospital, which, I am pleased to say, the hospital authorities came to their senses about and decided not to allow.

The worst case involved a mast upgrade, which does not need consent, for Copthall school. The application was to put a 3G mast on the roof of the school, and there seems little that the school can do about it other than negotiate. To put the matter in context, I have a pile of correspondence about that one mast—not objections, but merely correspondence between the council, school and mobile phone company. We must find ways of dealing with the matter other than hoping for good will from the mobile phone companies.

There is a general problem with 3G upgrades, which has led to the huge upsurge in applications. The issue first arose several years ago with the previous generation of mobile phone masts, and then it went quiet. Suddenly, it has become a major issue all over again.

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): On the issue of new areas of housing development, of which I have a lot in my constituency of Basingstoke, does the hon. Gentleman agree that more planning in advance of houses being built could allow sites to be set aside for mobile phone operators to use to ensure better coverage in those new areas of housing? At the moment, new houses are built without any consideration for the mobile phone coverage that those areas might require.

Mr. Dismore: The hon. Lady makes an important point. My constituency contains one of the fastest-growing neighbourhoods in London, with potentially 10,000 extra households over the next five to 10 years. The more general point is that developers tend to overlook the whole impact on public services, whether mobile phones or otherwise. It is difficult to devise a strategy whereby mobile phone masts can be erected safely on some of those dense new developments.

The Bill seems rather complex. I am concerned about who will draft the precautionary principle statement. If it is not done independently, I suspect that mobile phone companies will be pleading in their own cause. I am also concerned about who will produce the beam of greatest intensity certificate. Will that be done independently? If it is done by the mobile phone companies, where is the guarantee of independence?

The Bill should be a lot simpler. Mobile phone masts should go through the full planning process to allow people to object. There should be full planning processes for replacement 3G masts—they should not be seen as permitted development simply because a mast is already there. We should have much stronger powers to take into account precautionary principles beyond the code of practice, which is simply not enough. Public concern, most of all about health, must be reflected in those considerations. I know that the scientific evidence is somewhat ambivalent, but the problem is that a clear guarantee cannot be given, and until and unless one can be given, local communities will be concerned, and they are entitled to have those concerns recognised.

If there is a vote on the Bill, I shall vote for it. In Committee, however, I hope to adopt the philosophy of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). Some big changes are needed to make the Bill less complex and more straightforward and to address the concerns of the public.

Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove) (LD): I am delighted to support the Bill. The right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) generously gave me credit for an earlier version, and indeed I consider this an important subject. I also thank the right hon. Gentleman for the measured way in which he put his case. He made it very clear that his Bill did not constitute an attempt to disable the mobile phone industry or to close mobile phone networks. I do not want to do that either. I have a mobile phone, as the House will unfortunately have heard earlier today, so I cannot possibly say anything against them. However, I am glad that the issue has returned to the House. I hope that the Minister will not just be sympathetic, as I know he always is, and will not just be emollient, as I know he always is. I hope that he will say "Let us give the Bill some serious examination at the next stage," because that is plainly what the public want and what Members want.

The problem goes back to the Telecommunications Act 1984, which—as the right hon. Gentleman explained very clearly—exempted masts from planning rules, and from the subsequent reiteration by Governments that all matters relating to health were subject to national Government rather than local government decisions. That means that all health aspects have been removed from consideration, as have a wide range of base stations.

The difficulties have been compounded by the oppressive contracts that mobile phone companies arrange with those who permit masts to be placed on their property. That first came to my attention when a secondary school in my area, Marple Hall, agreed to a mast being placed on its property in the early days of telecommunications masts. Following a fair amount of protest from parents and others in the neighbourhood, the school rescinded its decision, only to find that the contract that it had signed did not entitle it to have the mast removed. It had signed away its rights to such an extent that the company could install any replacement mast that it chose, and could carry out any repairs, maintenance or alterations that it wished to undertake. In fact, the school had completely forgone its property rights.

In another case in my constituency, a mast was alleged to be less than 15 m high and thus not to require permission. Again there were bitter objections. Someone went to the trouble of measuring the mast, which proved to be not less than 15 m high, but 16 m high. The local authority took action against the company for installing a mast above the permitted height, on valid planning grounds. Those grounds were challenged by the company. The Secretary of State's inspector upheld the council's decision, and ordered that the mast be removed. The company's response was very straightforward: it said "We will take the 16 m mast down, cut 1 m off and put it back." It is that sort of response—waving two fingers at the law and the intention of the law—that has so deeply angered Members and their constituents.

The right hon. Gentleman covered the health issue very well. It is a question not of manifest and apparent danger, but of a suspicion that it will come to light in future that there were hazards that were not taken properly into account. That is what Sir William Stewart addressed in his two reports.

I hope the House will note that the two other parties in the House are committed to changing the present system. During the debate on the earlier version of the Bill on 18 March, the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker)—speaking, I assume, on behalf of the Conservative party—said

"the next Conservative Government will require all phone masts, regardless of size and proposed site, to be subject to the full planning permission process".

[Andrew Stunell]

I am delighted that, at least then, that was Conservative policy. I am not sure whether the policy has been subjected to a U-turn or has been reviewed in the meantime; perhaps the Minister will tell us later.

In that same debate, some election literature from the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne), who is a Labour Member, was read into the record. He said that Labour would "do everything we can to ensure that there are no more phone masts near schools and hospitals".—[Official Report, 18 March 2005; Vol. 432, c. 570, 568.]

I concede that that was only election literature and that, like manifesto promises on ID cards and other matters, it could have changed since, but I hope that the Minister will say that that is the intention of the Labour Government.

Dr. Pugh: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne) is a Minister in the Department of Health at the moment, is he not?

Andrew Stunell: I am sure that what I think they call collective Cabinet responsibility will mean that what the Minister says to the House today will bind all his colleagues at all levels. I hope that that will be the case. I hope that what he says will bind the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the new constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline and West Fife (Willie Rennie). The Chancellor is, I suspect, the person who is least likely to be happy with the Bill, because he may face some angry phone companies asking whether they can have their £30 billion back. That is the elephant in the room, because fantastic sums of money are involved in the promotion of the industry. Clearly, any constraint on trade is viewed by the industry with the utmost suspicion and it fights against it.

Every Member of Parliament to whom I have ever spoken on the issue has a significant case load of difficult and aggravating planning consents and disputes about the installation of masts. There is no way that the current planning exemptions can be justified. Arguably, they were right to get the industry started, but it is now 60 million customers strong. It is capable of coughing up £30 billion for its next generation of installation. The idea that it needs special help to proceed is outdated and wrong.

The health risks are an additional factor. I am pleased that the Bill deals with that by requiring what amounts to an individual MOT health certificate for those masts that are close to and beaming on health facilities and schools.

Mr. Hunt: On the health issue, does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is particular concern about technologies such as terrestrial trunked radio, the use of which is not as widespread and which operates on different frequencies? With those different frequencies, which are not used by ordinary mobile phone users, but are used by the police, ambulance services and others, the health concerns are much greater. Is not that also a good reason for the precautionary principle to be incorporated into planning laws in respect of mobile phone masts?

Andrew Stunell: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. The problem with the TETRA masts is that they are new. To some extent, we have learned to live with whatever is coming out of the previous generations of masts and become a little more familiar with them, but the new TETRA networks are an increasing concern. Those concerns could be met—indeed, the industry says that they will be met very easily—by stating specific precautionary principles in the Bill.

It is generally said—I was interested in what the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) said—that the Bill could be simplified, strengthened and generally improved. I am happy to believe that all those things are true, but none will happen unless it receives a Second Reading. I urge the House to allow that so that the matter may be discussed further, our constituents' concerns may be properly addressed and the interests and anxieties of many hon. Members may be dealt with.

1.34 pm

Nia Griffith (Llanelli) (Lab): I would like to draw the House's attention to the Christmas-tree effect. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) said, what do we do where there is legitimate permission for a mast? I refer to one in my constituency on Bigyn hill, which was erected in the early 1960s for police use. That mast has begun to look like a Christmas tree whose loving tenders have bought an enormous number of decorations. One apparatus after another is tagged on, with each adding to the grotesque look of the mast and to the immense concern of the parents of children at the primary school just underneath it. The Bill could deal not only with the masts themselves but with the additional equipment that is tagged on to them.

The second issue that concerns me is how on earth these companies can pick a very densely populated urban area such as Dafen in my constituency and suggest putting up a mast there, right next to Prince Philip hospital, when there are wide open spaces not far away. The people who will be affected in their homes, schools and hospitals must be taken into consideration so that companies do not pick such areas when there are clearly alternatives.

We are all—let us be honest—users of mobile phones. We all need and want the technology, and it would be hypocritical to say that we do not. However, there are alternatives to sticking masts right in the middle of places that are full of people living and working as opposed to emptier areas. We must make that message extremely clear. Masts are clearly being deliberately put in places that are unsuitable when there are more suitable places available. I ask the Minister to give serious thought to the multiple use of masts and to the initial consideration of planning applications.

1.36 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): I rise to speak in strong support of the Bill and to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) on presenting it to us. His speech was rational, reasonable and effective. The cross-party support that the Bill has received is very encouraging. This is the third or fourth occasion on which such a measure has been before the House, and it is a pity that we have not made a great deal of progress to date. I hope that the Minister, who is a reasonable man and is listening hard, will take on board the view shared by many of us that it would be good for the Bill to go into Committee so that these matters can be discussed at greater length and in greater detail. As we have heard, this issue concerns many of our constituents.

Of course, we all use mobile phones. Like my right hon. Friend, I am rather challenged when it comes to some aspects of technology, and I came rather late to using mobile phones, but they are absolutely vital to the work that we do and the lives that we lead. However, technological developments always have consequences. These masts are not only an eyesore and a nuisance but a potential health risk.

I want to highlight the situation of residents who are constantly battling with mobile phone operators who keep applying for an opportunity to have a mobile phone mast in an area close to residential properties. When one operator has been refused, another comes along and goes through the same procedure. In parts of my constituency, including Iris avenue, West Heath road and Woolwich road, people have had two or three different operators make the same application once one has been rejected. That creates worry for residents and means that they have to give up a lot of their time in being vigilant and ensuring that they are on the ball as regards what is going on. Often they do not receive notification from the phone company or the local authority because the consultation has taken place in such a narrow area that they are just outside it. I welcome the opportunity that the Bill gives us to discuss how we could make masts subject to the full planning application.

This morning, I met Alan Eaton and the Orange Squash Group, who got together a petition of 750 local residents in the northern part of my constituency. They support the Bill, and I urge Members to enable consideration of it in Committee, so that their concerns about locating such masts in the vicinity of schools or other sensitive sites can be aired, we can establish a new modus operandi and everyone can be happy with where these masts are being located.

I accept that the health issue, which many of us are concerned about, is a very difficult one. As we heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Horam), reports from Sweden and elsewhere show that the location of such masts does give rise to serious health concerns. The danger to health remains unproven, but the fear of those who feel that they and their families will be affected in the long term by the locating of masts near to their schools and homes is very real.

Dr. Pugh: There is also the unresolved issue of electro-sensitivity: in other words, even though there may be no effect on people in general in a given area, individuals could be substantially affected by something that does not affect the majority.

Mr. Evennett: I am very grateful for that intervention and I endorse entirely what the hon. Gentleman says; it is important to bear in mind that such problems could be specific, rather than general.

Many of the mobile phone masts in Bexley could have been located more sensitively, away from schools, hospitals, old people's homes and residential areas. We urge phone companies to locate them away from such areas, but so far, we have been spectacularly unsuccessful, even though there are plenty of open spaces—motorways, for example—that might be more appropriate locations.

Mr. Hunt: I wholeheartedly agree with what my hon. Friend is saying. Does he agree that some residents are concerned about the effect on property prices of placing mobile phone masts in residential areas, and that many such fears could be allayed if mobile phone companies had to go through the proper consultation process that the Bill requires? A resident in my constituency, in consultation with an estate agent, has estimated that erecting just one mobile phone mast in his area would impact on property prices to the tune of some £1 million. Does my hon. Friend agree that that is another reason why we should support the Bill?

Mr. Evennett: That is a very fair and important point and it is another reason why the Bill should proceed to Committee.

This is a worthwhile Bill and it deserves further consideration and discussion. We hear all too often that politicians do not listen to their constituents, but today we have found cross-party support for action on this issue. This is an opportunity for us to take on board our constituents' concerns and to do something about them. I very much hope that when the Minister winds up, he will agree that we should proceed along these lines, have further discussions and support my right hon. Friend's Bill this afternoon.

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): I, too, want to begin by thanking the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) for introducing this Bill, which deals with an area of planning policy that is challenging to policy makers and is important to many people. The issues to which the placement of mobile phone masts gives rise are significant to many people, and particularly to those in my Hove and Portslade community. I have received a lot of correspondence on this subject, and I have been approached in person by many concerned residents and been made aware of a number of local campaigns. Several forums have recently been held, at which all the stakeholders involved—members of the local authority, residents and representatives of the telecommunications industry—engaged in reasonable debate. As would be expected, the meetings rarely reach a consensus, but they are highly productive. The educative value of the meetings has led to more informed debate on the subject in my constituency. During the election campaign, I also made a commitment to the people of Hove and Portslade to investigate the concerns about mobile phone masts and to act on them when appropriate. I am grateful for the opportunity to do so today.

In 2002, the Government, in conjunction with the mobile phone industry, pledged £7.4 million for research into the safety of mobile phones. I am pleased also that the Government continue to remain committed to investing resources into examining the impact of mobile phone technology on our everyday lives. Ministers are also committed to reviewing current planning procedure for mobile phone masts—a policy that I wholeheartedly support. I applaud right hon. and hon. Members for taking seriously the concerns of our constituents about the issue and I am satisfied that public health remains paramount in the consideration of any current or future policy.

However, given the regulatory framework on the placing of telephone masts, the public still have cause for confusion and concern. That is clearly supported by the continued presence of the issue at the top of many people's local agenda, as many hon. Members are well aware. Indeed, the interesting article written recently by the right hon. Gentleman for his local paper confirms that that is true for Members on both sides of the House. For example, there is a consensus among the scientific community that mobile phone emissions pose no direct health risk to users of phones or those situated near masts, but masts are no longer situated near schools on the recommendation of the Stewart report. If the Government believe the Stewart report evidence that phone masts pose no threat to public health, why recommend such a measure? Such contradictions have fostered hostility towards phone masts in the general public, who sense uncertainty among policy makers on the issue.

It is understandable that concerned constituents, many of whom have young children, seek clarity and reassurance on the issue. It is important that we are able to work together across the House to reach the clarity and consensus that is needed on the matter. Mobile phones have undoubtedly become an essential part of everyday life. It is important that we are able to strike a balance between the needs of many to use mobile phones and the suspected potential health concerns for some of our constituents.

During my surgeries, many constituents have raised the issue of the need for the further installation of the more powerful 3G telephone masts, which has formed part of the debate today. Again, it is a question of balance. One possible solution to the problem is the suggestion that the number of mobile phone relay stations could be reduced by having mobile phone companies share potential installation sites. I am pleased that the Government are looking at that option further as it would greatly reduce the need for other mast sites throughout the country.

The other area that should be investigated before any further legislation is made is the point at which perception of risk to general health translates into actual damage to health caused by the stress of the installation of a telecommunications mast in the vicinity of people's homes or schools. It is not sufficient to say that such effects are merely subjective, and I encourage the Government to consider the effects that constant stress can have on a family with young children. As a mother myself, I understand the concerns that other parents may have about the health of their families. However, that is not to say that my constituents do not understand the ever-growing need for mobile technology in our day-to-day life.

My constituents are understandably concerned when scientific reports recommend restricted phone use by younger children. My constituents do not believe that such recommendations tally with the telecommunications industry assertion that there is nothing to fear from the emissions caused by masts. My constituents' concern is that the scientific evidence gathered so far is not conclusive. Although the Stewart report stated that there was no threat to health, the recommendation that installation sites should not be near schools sends parents a contradictory message. Many of my constituents conclude that if it is not recommended that mobile phone masts be installed near a school, it should not be acceptable for such a mast to be erected in a residential street where many young children live. Whether or not there is a scientifically accurate basis for not installing mobile phone masts near schools, it is on that apparent contradiction that many of my constituents have formulated their stance on the issue.

The report has continued to cause much stress and anxiety, which could in certain instances lead to tangible medical conditions. Constituents' concerns are real and deep-felt and cause genuine distress to all those affected. As legislators, it is our obligation to take their worries into consideration, and I am pleased that Labour-led Brighton and Hove city council has always given high priority to the concerns of local residents.

I am also greatly encouraged by the Government's continued commitment to that field of research following publication of the Stewart report—the most comprehensive study to be commissioned by any Government in the developed world. The report states that there are gaps in our scientific knowledge about mobile phones, and I encourage my hon. Friend the Minister and the mobile phone industry to continue their commitment to pursue an active and forward-looking programme of research to seek answers to those gaps in our knowledge.

On 3G telephone mast installation, I recommend that we err on the side of caution, especially when children are concerned. We already know that our children are more susceptible than adults to the effects of mobile phone emissions. It is, therefore, reasonable that we take a more considered approach to the further installation of the new generation of more powerful 3G telephone masts.

I am eager not to take up too much time, as other Members want to speak, but I am pleased to have been given the opportunity to raise my concerns on this most important of issues. The health of our children should be brought more to the fore, as it transcends the boundaries of party politics. As their elected representatives, it is important that we maintain a dialogue with our constituents and that the results of further scientific studies are made more easily accessible to those who are affected the most.

Again, I highlight my appreciation for the Government's continued commitment to examining the health concerns of those affected by mobile phone masts, and I once more express my appreciation to the right hon. Gentleman for initiating this timely debate.

1.52 pm

Mrs. Maria Miller (Basingstoke) (Con): I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) on this excellent Bill. I hope that the Minister will see fit to let it proceed to Committee, as the issue is important for all our constituents. It is especially important in north Hampshire, as is evident by the attendance of several north Hampshire MPs at the debate. The Bill gives us the opportunity to debate a subject that is not only of concern in the minds of many of our constituents, but generates a lot of casework. By sorting out the problem, the Minister will do much to help us all.

Many Basingstoke residents feel that planning rules favour the interests of network operators over the legitimate concerns of local residents. They feel that their concerns are in many ways ignored by central Government, yet cannot be taken into account by local authorities, whose planning powers are severely restricted in the present system. As well as my right hon. Friend's Bill, I should like to consider whether other measures could be added, as I intimated in an intervention earlier.

Twenty-seven per cent. of all phone calls are made on mobile phones, but there is no requirement for developers to take mobile phone coverage into account when seeking planning permission for new developments. In Basingstoke, many new developments are a cause of concern in that regard. Hundreds of homes are being built in places such as Sherfield park and Popley fields, yet no analysis was carried out before the area was developed to assess whether there was sufficient coverage for mobile phone masts—whether more needed to be built and whether more land would be needed for that.

If indeed there is a need for increased coverage in the area, surely it would be easier and more sensible to provide that by planning in mobile phone coverage in the same way as we plan in many other utilities in advance of house building. Perhaps in that way we could also take account of the point that my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt) made about the impact of mobile phone masts on house prices, which is a concern in my constituency too.

I am pleased that my local authority, Basingstoke and Deane borough council, in support of the Bill today, passed a motion on 16 February which reiterated residents'

"particular concern over the siting of masts near to schools, hospitals, and residential properties";

the widely held perception that

"legislation is weighted in favour of mobile phone companies"; and the deep frustration that local authorities

"currently" have

"little power to act on" their

"residents' concerns."

Residents urged us to take part in today's debate, which I am pleased to be able to do.

Although there is a code of conduct for operators, there are too many examples of where residents' real concerns simply cannot be taken fully into account. In Basingstoke we have had numerous problems in that respect, including an operator wanting to site a new mobile phone mast right next door to a school for children with special needs, in the centre of a residential area, with the local council and local residents feeling almost powerless to stop it. The Bill would address many of those concerns by clarifying and firming up the current rules, thereby making the whole system more transparent and building confidence for local residents.

The Bill would help residents' concerns to be heard about the health effects of mobile phones. It would require any mast application to include a statement describing any threats to health or the environment, as well as a description of where the radiation emitted by the masts would fall—the so-called "beam of greatest intensity certificate". Both are eminently sensible measures which would increase accountability, transparency and, importantly, confidence in our planning system. The Bill would also help local residents have more say in where masts are sited by removing the automatic right to erect a mast below 15 m in height, and prevent the use of compulsory purchase powers by landowners to acquire certain sorts of facilities.

For those reasons, I shall support the Bill today, and hope that the Minister uses this opportunity to be seen to be listening to the concerns of my constituents, and the constituents of other hon. Members in the House today, to make changes in this important area.

1.57 pm

Mr. Tobias Ellwood (Bournemouth, East) (Con): I am grateful to be called to speak in this important debate and I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) on introducing the Bill. I do hope that it has more success than its predecessors, which ran into the ground, and I am slightly concerned by the inch-high stack of papers that the Minister has on the Dispatch Box in preparation for his summation. I encourage him to take the first and the last sheets and to save the rest for Committee.

I fully support the Bill. It empowers local authorities, gives greater transparency to the planning process and improves consultation with residents. This legislation is well overdue and it is interesting to hear that we are now playing catch-up with Scotland. We have heard that to date there is a national roll-out from the five mobile phone companies of about 45,000 masts, and I understand from reports that we are about halfway through; we are looking at a total of about 100,000 masts, and that is with the third generation network. Nowhere is that more evident than in Bournemouth, where every month or so we have a new application for a mast. We still require another 40 masts in the Bournemouth area.

It could be argued that because we all have mobile phones in our pockets, we should stomach the fact that we need mobile phone masts. Well, we all use cars and we all use electricity, but we still have proper regulation of where roads and power stations are put. The same should apply to mobile phone masts.

We have experienced a litany of problems in the Bournemouth area: poor consultation, and confusion in the interpretation of permitted development, which has led to demonstrations and petitions by the residents. I take my hat off to Bournemouth council for going some way to take steps to support the Bill and to try to rectify the problems that we have encountered. However, I would encourage the council to go slightly further and open up council land to mobile phone masts use—something that is not currently allowed. We still have another 40 masts to go, and there is still an awful lot of confusion about where they are supposed to be placed. If the Bill passes all the relevant stages, it will certainly provide a more palatable, open, transparent and fair process—something with which the whole House would agree.

Mr. Hunt: I thank my hon. Friend for texting me on my mobile phone this morning, thus allowing me to get back from my constituency in time for the start of the debate. He talks about transparency in the planning process. Does he agree that the point of that process is to balance the interests of commercial operators with those of the residents—it is not intended to side with one or the other, but to balance those interests—and that it is for the Government to justify any exemption to that planning process, not for us to argue why that exemption should be lifted?

Mr. Ellwood: My hon. Friend makes a very important point, and I thank him for making it into the Chamber in order to do so. It is vital that we arm local authorities with the necessary powers to deal with such issues appropriately, and that should start here in the Chamber.

I should like to go further than the Bill. If it is debated in Committee, I shall be keen to pursue a new clause to consider the possibility of introducing a single mast network. That may seem a little strange at first. However, we have a single network for water, but people can apply to many companies for their water. There is a single network for domestic gas, but people can get their gas supply from a number of companies. The same applies to landlines—whether from BT, NTL or any other service provider—as they all share the same system. Why cannot we have the same process for mobile phone masts? That happens in other countries; it could be easily introduced here.

Clearly, there would be some technical challenges, and such a change may well have to wait until the fourth generation roll-out of masts. However, we must start somewhere and the Bill could be the place to do so. I should certainly like such a new clause to include the idea that the Government would report back to Parliament on a feasibility study to find out whether the technical hurdles that would be encountered could be overcome.

Concern has been raised about the cost of the licences. Clearly, the company representatives to whom I have spoken seem very keen to pursue the issue. Of course, they want to protect the money that they put in during the licensing auctions that took place a number of years ago.

It is worth remembering that more than 100 years ago we had a rather confusing telegraph system, with independent companies set up in London and a spaghetti network of wires going across the city's rooftops. Eventually, the Government said, "This is too much."—the sprawl of wires was getting out of control—"Let's have a single system." That is exactly what we could have with the introduction of one network for mobile phone masts, thus reducing the number of mobile masts by about two thirds. That gets to the very heart of the problem that we are discussing.

In conclusion, I fully support the Bill. It would provide local authorities with more power, which they require, and local residents with more say in the planning process. I hope that it will allow us to take the first steps in considering a nationwide mast network.

2.3 pm

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I, too, will be very brief. Like other hon. Members, I should like to hear what the Minister has to say about the Bill. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) on introducing the Bill. Mobile phones are important to all our lives, but the growth in their use has, of course, been phenomenal. There are more than 62 million mobile phone subscribers now, compared with 9 million when the Government first came to power in 1997, and 85 per cent. of households now have mobile phones.

The background to the Bill is a concern of which all hon. Members are aware from their constituencies. In the eyes of our constituents, masts can affect people's health, particularly when they are sited close to schools and medical facilities, without any proper consultation with local communities. As my right hon. Friend and other Members have explained, the problem is that the siting of such masts is effectively outside the planning process. No proper consultation with communities therefore takes place and people feel disfranchised from the decisions that are taken. The Government's own expert committee urged that a precautionary approach be taken to the siting of masts. That is reflected in the Bill, which would ensure that new masts—not existing ones—would be subject to full planning permission and that health considerations could be taken into account when applications were considered.

The precise detail of the proposals will need to be examined and scrutinised—I hope in Committee. We will need to consider their impact on the number of applications and the extension of 3G coverage. The number of planning applications would certainly increase. All those aspects can be dealt with.

The principle of the Bill—that local communities should be properly consulted over the location of masts—must be right. For too long there has been a creeping attitude that the Government know best and a process whereby too many decisions are, in effect, taken out of local control and away from local communities. We have seen that in a number of areas of our lives where the say of local communities has been taken away and responsibility has been moved to a regional level—in relation to the police service, the fire service, planning decisions and so on—or to Government. The idea that is it wrong to consult local communities and involve them in such decisions and that no objections to the siting of masts may be brooked simply because the Government have judged that mobile phones are good for us all is profoundly anti-democratic.

The Labour manifesto for the last election stated, perfectly reasonably:

"People want a sense of control over their own neighbourhood."

If that is to be adhered to and applied, the Government should support the principle behind the Bill and at least be willing to examine the Bill and discuss with us in Committee how it might operate.

Concern about the issue will grow. One suggestion is that 3G technology will require up to four times as many masts as at present. That would mean 135,000 more masts in the country—more than 200 for every constituency. The issue will not go away and it is no longer acceptable to sweep the concerns of local people aside. We must be capable of achieving a sensible balance.

I have left plenty of time in which the Minister can respond without talking out the Bill. If he is still speaking at 2.30 pm, the House will know that the Government's real intention is not to support the Bill. The Bill has had support from hon. Members on both sides of the House and I hope that the Government will therefore allow it to go into Committee so that it can be discussed further.

2.7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): I, too, congratulate the right hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) on securing a place in the ballot for private Members' Bills and using the opportunity to debate this significant topic. As he knows, the subject is important to the Government and is of widespread interest and concern to hon. Members and the public.

The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) suggested that there was going to be subterfuge by talking out the Bill, but we are quite clear that we do not support the Bill—we are quite happy to say that. However, where the Government agree with the right hon. Gentleman—I commend him on the tone in which he introduced the Bill—is in recognising that we have to move the situation on and that there is concern and fear because of a perceived health risk, although all the evidence shows that there is no such risk. I will come on to that. I apologise to the hon. Member if it will cause him offence if I am still talking at 2.30 pm, but I have a lot of information to put across.

We published our latest report this week, as the right hon. Gentleman was generous enough to acknowledge. It runs to some 40 pages, but expresses matters concisely and precisely. We are advised that the latest data from the research commissioned as a result of the paper will be with us by the end of April. We are determined to move the issue on in order to reassure the public and deal with the legitimate concerns that are being expressed by hon. Members. I accept entirely that this matter will not go away. The Government are not making any attempt to say that the issue does not need attention. It does need attention, we are giving it attention and we will give it a lot more in the months ahead.

Before I get into the substantive matters addressed in the clauses, I should like to set this discussion in the wider context, which has been referred to piecemeal by hon. Members over the past couple of hours. It has been one of the Government's objectives to create the most dynamic, competitive communications industries in the world, ensuring universal access to a choice of diverse services of the highest quality and that citizens and consumers are safeguarded.

The UK is at the forefront of the service provision of electronic communications technology. It is estimated that, in 2004, the UK communications sector contributed £47.4 billion to the UK economy, forming about 4.1 per cent. of UK GDP. However, it is a fact that if we want our mobile phones to work, there is a need to be within a few hundred metres of a base station. To enable us to send and receive signals from our handsets, some sort of relaying apparatus is needed. The technology of base stations means that each one can handle only a certain number of calls. The more that people use mobile phones, the greater the need for base stations.

The coverage of a cellular system is provided by a network of radio base stations, each with a certain coverage area or cell. A base station is a facility that provides transmission and reception for radio systems. There are three types of cells. Macro cells provide the main structure for the base station network. The base stations for macro cells have power outputs of tens of watts and communicate with phones up to about 22 miles distant. Micro cells are used to infill and improve the main network, especially where the volume of calls is high. They are sited in places such as airports, railway stations and shopping malls. The micro cell base stations emit less power than those for macro cells and their range is considerably shorter. Pico cells have a lower power output than that of micro cells—it is a few watts—and are generally sited inside buildings.

Communication systems are obviously driven by demand. Increase in the use of mobile phones has meant that operators are continually expanding their networks to accommodate customer requirements of service and quality. However, the base stations need to be where the users are. Consequently, the greatest need for base station sites is usually in built-up areas where there is the highest density of mobile users, and within a mile or two of main roads, where demands on network capacity are greatest.

The size of each cell is determined by a number of factors, but particularly the number of subscribers expected to require access to the system during the peak usage period. In areas where call traffic density exceeds the limits of the network, capacity can be expanded either by introducing new sites—macro or micro cells—or by splitting existing cells, thus effectively doubling capacity. Cell splitting requires the erection of additional antennae at the base station site or a new base station site.

The location of transmitter antennae is important. Obviously, signals from one cell will interfere with nearby cells on the same frequency. To avoid blind spots from buildings and hills, antennae must usually be placed high up. In urban areas antennae are often best placed on existing buildings. However, in rural areas, a lattice mast is often required. Technically, that is all a mast is—a tower structure.

There are currently about 45,000 base stations in the United Kingdom. The right hon. Gentleman referred to a higher figure, and I am sure that he has the latest data, given his research for this morning's debate. The Mobile Operators Association estimates that the number of base stations will increase to at least 50,000 by the end of 2007. That does not mean 50,000 sites or 50,000 masts, because many of these base stations will be installed on existing structures or be collocated with the apparatus of another operator. If we do not have this infrastructure the handsets will not work at the service level that users expect.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

Despite the undoubted popularity of mobile phones, however, there is significant disquiet about the infrastructure necessary to support them. A proposal for a new mobile phone mast is often accompanied by protests and objections, sometimes with justification and sometimes without, often because local communities are not sufficiently well informed.

The Government are sensitive to the public's concerns about the mobile network infrastructure. We acknowledge that many hon. Members and the public generally are concerned about the health and environmental impact of mobile phone base station developments. We recognise that there is a balance to be struck between the regulations and guidelines that facilitate the growth of the mobile phone network and the need to keep its environmental impact to a minimum and address public health concerns. The right hon. Gentleman covered those aspects widely in his introductory speech. The Government believe that the current arrangements broadly strike the right balance.

Mr. Ellwood: How does striking the right balance affect one village in Bournemouth, where a population of 50 to 60 is made to have five mobile phone masts from five different companies?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I acknowledge that there are anomalies around the country and I hope to consider the detail of protection and improvements to procedures that relate to planning controls and consultation arrangements for local communities later. However, the hon. Gentleman will have to be patient for a little because I want to deal with the impact on health.

First, let me assure hon. Members that the Government take seriously the need to protect the public from health risks. Indeed, we have spent considerable amounts of time and money on researching whether mobile phone technologies present a genuine health risk. Approximately 25,000 articles have been published in the past 30 years about the biological effects and medical applications of non-ionising radiation. Scientific knowledge about the matter is arguably more extensive than for most chemicals.

In the United Kingdom, we have held two major reviews of the total experimental and epidemiological evidence for health effects due to exposure to radio-frequency transmissions, including those associated with mobile telephone handsets and base stations.

The first report was published in 2000 by the Independent Expert Group on Mobile Phones and is commonly known as the Stewart report. It concluded that "the balance of evidence indicates that there is no general risk to the health of people living near to base stations on the basis that exposures are expected to be small fractions of the guidelines."

However, the Government acknowledge that it also said

"that it is not possible at present to say that exposure to radiofrequency radiation even at levels below national guidelines, is totally without potential adverse health effects, and that the gaps in knowledge are sufficient to justify a precautionary approach".

The hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mrs. Miller) referred to that.

Part of the precautionary approach recommended by the group was the adoption of the International Commission on Non-Ionising Radiological Protection—ICNIRP—guidelines for public exposure. The Government have introduced standards to ensure that all base stations meet those guidelines, which are five times tougher about public exposure than the National Radiological Protection Board guidelines, which were used previously. Those guidelines are adopted in the majority of other countries in the European Union.

The second major review of the total experimental and epidemiological evidence was undertaken by the then National Radiological Protection Board advisory group on non-ionising radiation and was published in January 2004. That report fulfils the recommendation of the first Stewart report that the issue should be reviewed in three years. It also concluded:

"Exposure levels from living near to mobile base stations are extremely low and the overall evidence indicates that they are unlikely to pose a risk to health".

Seventeen similar reviews have been conducted internationally. They were undertaken by organisations such as France's Commission for Consumer Safety, the Health Council of the Netherlands, the Swedish State Radiation Protection Authority, the Royal Society of Canada Expert Panel, the ICNIRP and the World Health Organisation. They all concluded that current evidence does not confirm the existence of any adverse health consequences from exposure to low-level electromagnetic fields.

The Government are not complacent, however, and we have established the mobile telephone health research—MTHR—programme, which is costing around £8.8 million and is funded jointly by Government and industry. The programme is being directed and overseen by an independent management committee led by Professor Lawrie Challis OBE and is made up of leading UK and international experts. It is carrying out research into the effects of mobile phone technology on health and encompasses emerging radio-based technologies. The process will ensure that Government and the public are kept up to date with new research findings.

The programme management committee has been responsible for the selection of proposals to be funded. The programme is funding only research of the highest quality that meets the research requirements suggested by the World Health Organisation and follows its criteria for good laboratory practice. It fits with similar work done in other countries and with the EU framework projects in this area. The programme has funded 25 projects so far.

Work already funded by the programme includes studies of mobile phone users to investigate whether the use of mobile phones can affect the risk of developing brain cancer or leukaemia, studies investigating the effects of mobile phone signals on brain function and the behaviour of exposed people, studies examining how mobile phone signals could produce biological effects as evidenced by changes in exposed cells, and a study investigating ways in which mobile phones affect the performance of drivers.

On 20 March 2003 the MTHR programme announced the first proposal to be supported, which is concerned with mobile phone base stations and is one of the first such studies in the world. The epidemiological study addresses public concerns about possible health risks from exposure to emissions from base stations. The study was selected in recognition of the public concern about the proliferation of mobile phone masts, and of the need for research to investigate whether they could have health effects. The study will also investigate whether people may differ in their sensitivity to radio-frequency emissions.

I shall not go into further detail about health issues now, since those will come up again as I go through the clauses of the Bill. However, I stress that the Government are not complacent. We are committed to keeping the mobile phone technologies under review. In the light of such studies and international research programmes, I can assure the House that if the scientific advice changes, the Government will act.

Mr. Hunt: The Minister said that the Government are not complacent and are keeping the health issues under review. Will he therefore confirm that the Government's decision not to support the Bill is not the result of any deal with mobile phone operators to keep their exemptions from planning requirements in return for the large amounts that they paid for 3G licences?

Jim Fitzpatrick: I can wholly reassure the hon. Gentleman that that is not the case. If I get the opportunity later, I shall deal with previous allegations of deals between Government and mobile phone operators. We have evidence to demonstrate that that is a scurrilous allegation and totally without foundation. We are working with the mobile operators. As the right hon. Gentleman said, having had a meeting with them this week, the operators acknowledge that there is a gap and that progress can be made, and they are keen to co-operate. I hope that is adequate reassurance for the hon. Gentleman that no skulduggery is going on in any way, shape or form.

Let me set out the Government's record in terms of the planning regime and managing the environmental impacts of communications developments. The Government have strengthened the planning regulations twice, in 1999 and in 2001. In 2001 the regulations for prior approval were strengthened so that in effect they are very similar to the arrangements for full planning permission. The current planning arrangements have therefore been given very careful consideration.

The Stewart report on mobile phones and health published in 2000 recommended that telecommunication development should be subject to the normal planning process in order to improve local consultation. The Government considered that recommendation in detail and accepted the importance of ensuring that effective public consultation takes place.

As a result, the changes in 2001 significantly strengthened the planning arrangements for such developments. We increased the time for authorities to deal with prior approval applications from 28 and 42 days to a uniform 56. Public consultation requirements on prior approval procedures were strengthened so that they became exactly the same as those for applications for planning permission. Fees were increased from £35 to £190 to enable authorities to carry out full public consultation.

Our revised arrangements for prior approval applications have the same consultation requirements as applications for planning permission. Therefore, we have met the concerns that led the Stewart group to make the recommendation for full planning permission. The Government have also published revised planning policy guidance, which provides more information on their expectations for standards of consultation with local communities on new communications developments, particularly where the development would be near a school.

In November 2002, we also published the code of best practice on mobile phone network development. The code was produced jointly by central Government and local government and the mobile phone industry. It provides detailed guidance on consultation procedures between operators, local authorities and local people. The Government attach great importance to securing good design in development generally and the code's advice on good siting and design of new communications developments has helped to direct development to the most appropriate locations and to minimise environmental impact and visual intrusion.

Mention has already been made by right hon. and hon. Members of the review that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Welsh Assembly Government commissioned the university of Reading and Arup to undertake in September 2004. Their independent study was designed to assess the impact that the code of best practice on mobile phone network development has had since its introduction, how local authorities have implemented the code and how the public perceive its operation.

The review was completed in March last year. The ODPM is considering the findings and recommendations set out in the report and how we should take them forward within the context of the wider review of planning arrangements for telecommunications developments. We took a decision to publish the report this week to inform today's debate, which has been mentioned by several colleagues.

Before I talk about the content, I want to address some criticisms that have been made of the Government's handling of the report. The review was carried out in consultation with stakeholders, and representatives from local authorities, the industry and Mast Action UK were on the steering group. Its conclusions were reasonably widely known.

Those Members who have had the opportunity to read the report will have seen that it is not negative; it is balanced. The general conclusion is that, where the code works, it works well, but that there is room for improvement, which is where the recommendations focus. That is where the Government will be focusing their attention.

We are keen to ensure that every community that is affected by a development proposal for a telecommunications apparatus can be assured that it will have the opportunity to comment and that the decision-making process is open, fair and consistent.

Allegations have been made:

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

"By not publishing the report the Government is allowing telecommunications companies to continue to erect phone masts while openly flouting Government guidelines and codes of best practice and ignoring the wishes of local communities affected by masts."

That is simply not true. I have already outlined how the Government have, since 1997, twice strengthened the consultation requirements to ensure that local communities have an opportunity to express their views on telecommunications developments. Although there has been considerable improvement, the Government think there is still more to do. I can assure the House that we are looking at this issue closely and will continue to do so to determine the best way forward. The recommendations of the report will assist in that process.

Another allegation that has been made is that the £22 billion paid for third generation licences put the Government under an obligation to let the industry do what it wants. That is ridiculous, as I said a few moments ago in response to the question asked by the hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mr. Hunt). The licences were auctioned in April 2000. In August 2000, the Government strengthened the planning regulations, and if we decide we need to strengthen the regulations further, we will.

The rate of development of new base stations is determined by the industry and influenced by licence requirements and market forces. The rate of development has slowed now that 2G networks are rolled out. The licence requirement for 3G networks has to be met by the end of 2007, but clearly development will not stop then as demand continues to grow.

The Government recognise that this issue will not go away. That is why it is so critical that any changes we make to the planning arrangements are effective and proportionate in the longer term.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I want to draw to your attention an incident that took place at Nottingham East Midlands airport on 4 February. Nottingham East Midlands airport is wholly within Leicestershire, and although the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) is the constituency Member of Parliament, the aeroplanes fly over my constituency, so the matter is of considerable interest to me as the Member for Harborough.

On 4 February a Ghanaian-registered DC86, owned by Johnsons Air and subcontracted to DHL, overshot the 3,000 m runway by about 50 m—apparently, there is a skid mark on the grass at the end of the runway. The aeroplane just managed to get airborne, and about one nautical mile out of the airport, as it flew towards Melbourne in the constituency of the hon. Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd), it was only about 400 ft above sea level—given the topography, about 100 ft above ground level. That incident should have been reported to the Civil Aviation Authority at once, as what is called a mandatory occurrence.

The reason why I bring this matter to the House's attention today is that the Minister with responsibility for aviation should by now have received a report from the CAA and should be in a position to respond to inquiries from Members of Parliament about it. Unfortunately, tomorrow—4 March—is the date on which the radar records and tapes of conversations between the air traffic control operators at Nottingham East Midlands airport and the pilot will be deleted.

It seems to me that this was a serious incident that could have led to loss of life and certainly to a great deal of damage in the area of the airport, as an apparently overloaded freighter attempted to get into the air. May I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to press, through the offices of Mr. Speaker, for a Minister in the Department for Transport to come to the House at the earliest opportunity to explain what has or has not been done in relation to the preservation of those records and the filing of a mandatory occurrence report with the CAA, and what Ministers who are politically accountable for this mess are doing about it?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): Obviously the incident was serious. I have no knowledge of the matter and there is nothing on which I can rule today, but clearly those who are responsible for such matters will have heard what the hon. and learned Gentleman said, or will eventually read it, and I trust that they will take appropriate action.

Public Swimming Pools

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Heppell.]

2.35 pm

Dr. Ashok Kumar (Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland) (Lab): I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for granting me the debate. I want to speak about the importance of swimming in the context of the overall development of sport in Britain, and—mindful of the coming Olympic games in 2012—about how we can encourage, train and nurture the rising generation of young swimmers who may be capable of representing our country. I also want to say a little about a campaign that began in the town of Guisborough, in my constituency, and to request support and help from the Government.

Swimming is an activity that can be an integral part of the development of a healthier nation. That is why I want the Government to put the maximum effort into the development of swimming and the provision of facilities and infrastructure for it. I am glad to say that the Government have stressed the importance of swimming as an activity, and in particular its importance for young children. That was emphasised in their response to a report from the Culture, Media and Sport Committee entitled "Testing the Waters". In its response, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport observed that both adults and children were failing to reach the recommended levels of physical activity. It also recognised the need to promote greater participation in physical activity, including swimming, among all groups. It pointed out that swimming was the largest single beneficiary of Sport England lottery funding to date, and that so far it had received no less than a sixth of sport lottery funds. However, some issues are still unresolved.

I want to focus on issues relating to my constituency. There is no doubt that in the past it has been well served by the local authorities in swimming pool provision. The constituency forms part of two boroughs—Middlesbrough, and Redcar and Cleveland. Middlesbrough has built a pool on the growing Coulby Newham estate; Redcar and Cleveland has provided pools in Saltburn, Loftus and Guisborough—all towns in my constituency. The pools were built in the mid-1960s, when capital funding for leisure was part of a straightforward compact between central and local government. The oldest, and the one in most need of enhancement or rebuilding, is the Guisborough pool, which receives some 60,000 visits a year. It was built as a temporary structure to last for a maximum of 10 years—a time limit that is now up. Guisborough, with a population of some 16,000, is the largest town in my constituency. It is clear to me that it should have a swimming pool that can serve a town of that size.

The existing pool hosts a number of swimming clubs, including the Guisborough swimming club, the Guisborough aqua fit club and the Guisborough life saving club. It is used extensively by children from the town's primary schools and the local secondary school. The secondary school recently achieved sports academy status, and the head teacher has said that he would incorporate swimming in its curriculum if only a better local facility were available.

[Dr. Ashok Kumar]

There is real potential in the community, which may be lost if the facilities are not available to accommodate it. Above all, the pool is valued as a leisure centre by people young and old from both the town and the neighbouring communities. More than five years ago, a group of amateur sport and leisure swimmers told me of their concern about the state of the baths. They feared that there was a real threat of closure. Their concern was heightened when Redcar and Cleveland council expressed anxiety about the health and safety implications of keeping open an old pool in nearby Redcar. It eventually had to close that pool—a decision that it regretted but felt was inevitable.

As a result, I launched a campaign in Guisborough to show the council the strength of feeling in Guisborough and in the surrounding communities about the need to keep the pool open. Over a short period, a petition was collected containing some 5,000 signatures. That was presented to the House. A more in-depth survey of public opinion was conducted in the town. That led to some 600 questionnaires being returned and analysed. That again showed both the need and the importance of the pool to the people of Guisborough.

To mobilise the campaign to save the swimming pool, Rob Vincent-Jones, the chair of the amateur swimming club, members of other user groups, other individuals and residents of Guisborough and I set up a steering group. It was recognised by all involved parties that there were no quick fixes for securing new facilities. As a result, a firm of consultants was hired to prepare an in-depth feasibility study, which looked at the present state of the pool and the demand for and supply of pool provision in the area. It went on to look at possible design and management options for a new pool and the funding strategy that would be needed to secure it. The report confirmed with empirical evidence that the building was near to its end in physical terms, and that it was a valued and important facility to the local townspeople and the local schools.

In order to explore all available avenues, I discussed that issue with my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport. He was very sympathetic and supportive, and recognised the difficulties that we were facing. In fact, he granted a meeting with me, and with a delegation from the Guisborough steering group, which was useful and worthwhile. He was very generous with his time, but he directed me to Sport England.

When the steering group and I met Sport England, it said that it followed a model called the Sport England facilities planning model, which is used to determine the distribution of funding within its remit. It is used rigidly across the UK as a guide for determining patronage of new or improved facilities and their relationship with other pools in the wider geographical area.

Sport England's own conclusion from running that model for Guisborough was that there was sufficient "waterspace" in the area to meet the existing demand. That was confirmed to me by Judith Rasmussen, Sport England's regional director for the north-east. I praise Judith and her staff, who have been very helpful and supportive, and with whom we have worked closely. However, that did not resolve our problem. It was a crucial setback.

I want to point out some features of the model that I feel require examination, and I ask the Minister to look at these issues. First, the model considers only the patronage and population figures in the wider geographical area. It does not consider the physical conditions of the other facilities and whether they meet the demands of a new century. It does not take into account the higher-cost profiles for running older pools or compare like with like, with a possible new pool on one site. It does not examine in any depth social inclusion issues, which are dear to the Government's heart and important for a borough such as Redcar and Cleveland, where there are many diverse and free-standing communities.

That factor is also important when we recognise that the existing pool lies in what is called the north Guisborough area of the town. The pool is adjacent to a large ex-local authority housing estate and an area that exhibits above average indices of unemployment, low achievement and ill health. The model fails to look at swimming in terms of wider benefits—community safety, the promotion of a healthy life style and the development of life skills among young people. That left us with a dilemma.

We have explored other avenues. At present, the most promising path appears to be a collaboration with a local landowner and developer. He wishes to market an area of land adjacent to the present town limits for housing, some of it social housing, and other mixed development. That could trigger a section 106 agreement to finance the capital costs of the pool, and perhaps even provide an element of the revenue costs for a certain period.

The proposal as it stands would be a departure from the approved local plan for Redcar and Cleveland. However, like the pool, that document has seen better days, and the borough council is now well advanced with its new local development framework programme, which, I am happy to say, has the potential for some new development within and around Guisborough. I hope that that will provide the catalyst for the new pool for which the town has been calling.

However, we are still seeking to explore all funding avenues, and I ask the Minister to undertake to consider three issues that are dear to me. First, when he and his colleagues meet Sport England, will they raise the issue of its facilities planning model and ask whether it meets the holistic need of the Government in seeing swimming as an activity that has manifold benefits, and whether it properly covers issues such as concentrating on areas of social deprivation and poor health such as those in parts of my constituency?

Secondly, will he encourage the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to widen its horizons when issuing planning policy statements, which can give valuable leadership in actively promoting the development and spread of sporting and swimming provision and give weight to possible planning obligations that include swimming provision as part of the development plan, especially when they offer guidance on planning gain and planning obligations to local planning authorities such as Redcar and Cleveland as regards the position on promoting sports—in this case, swimming? I hope that if that occurs, towns such as Guisborough will have a far better chance of securing a provision that is desperately required.

Thirdly, I invite the Minister for Sport, who has so far been sympathetic and supportive, to visit Guisborough to see for himself the state of the swimming pool, which illustrates the importance of this issue and the effect that it has had on the local community. I look forward to hearing the Minister's reply.

2.47 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Jim Fitzpatrick): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough, South and East Cleveland (Dr. Kumar) on his success in securing this debate. I will do my best to respond to all the issues that he raised.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said in this House a few weeks ago, investment in community facilities such as swimming pools should be a priority. The Government are committed to increasing sports participation, and swimming is one of the most popular forms of physical activity, with 5.5 million people swimming at least once a month. Access to good quality sporting provision, including swimming pools, is therefore an essential part of enabling people to lead healthier lives and to participate in sport. Concern about this issue has been reflected in my hon. Friend's important comments.

If I may, I will set out the national picture before turning to the specific points that my hon. Friend raised in relation to his constituency. One of the Government's public service agreement targets is to increase participation in sport by priority groups by 3 per cent. by 2008. However, one of the obstacles that prevents people from taking part is a lack of good quality sports facilities. That applies equally to all sections of the community. Our aim is that "by 2008, most people should be no more than 20 minutes travel time from a good quality, multi sports environment such as schools, sports clubs and leisure centres".

However, the scale of that challenge is immense. There is a clear deficit in funding for sports facilities alongside the fact that the existing facility stock is in a deteriorating condition, as described by my hon. Friend. The average age of local authority facilities is about 25 years. The national stock of sports centres requires some £550 million to be spent now to bring the condition up to a good and acceptable standard, without any upgrading to take account of modern trends in sports participation and current levels of demand.

However, the Government are taking a number of positive steps to address these issues. Currently, more than 4,400 swimming facilities across England are open to the public; 72 per cent. of them are owned by the local authority or by the education sector, and more than half are pay-and-play facilities. Since 2004, 131 pools have opened across the country, and more local authority pools have opened than have closed. Since 1997, the Government and lottery distributing bodies have, between them, invested more than £3 billion in physical activity and sport. In that time, £249 million of lottery investment has gone into swimming—the largest amount given to any sport—as my hon. Friend pointed out. Local authorities themselves will invest some £1 billion in sports services—facilities and development—over the next three years.

However, a strategic approach needs to be adopted. The problem is that many pools are old—built 25 years ago—in the wrong location and cost a lot of money to keep open. So we are challenging local authorities to put sport and swimming provision at the heart of what they do. For the first time ever, we will monitor local authority performance in sport provision through the comprehensive performance assessment, and we are committed to supporting local authorities in their efforts. Sport England has a swimming strategy in place and is working with local authorities to help them implement it. Many local authorities have also created their own strategies, so that community needs are met by the public and private sectors. We of course applaud that.

Sport England has also developed a range of strategic planning tools to assist local authorities in their strategic planning of sports facilities. They include modelling tools and demand estimators, which, together with the "active places" database of the supply of facilities, will help local authorities to identify gaps and to target resources where they are most needed; a benchmarking service that will provide rigorous and robust information on the performance of sports facilities in comparison with other such facilities; and a planning obligations kitbag that will allow local authorities, developers and other stakeholders to facilitate the provision of community sports facilities associated with residential developments.

On the situation in my hon. Friend's constituency, there are some nine swimming pools—including the Guisborough pool—located at five sites in the Redcar and Cleveland borough council area. As he said, a supply-and-demand modelling exercise undertaken in 1999 indicated that this level of provision was enough to meet demand, but it made no reference to quality or to issues specific to the local authority. I understand that the council and Sport England have since had a number of discussions about the need to update the council's swimming facilities strategy to take account of these issues, and that Sport England has offered some financial assistance to enable the council to undertake the necessary work. I urge the council to take up that offer.

I appreciate that my hon. Friend has concerns about the extent to which Sport England's facilities planning model deals with the issues of age and social inclusion, and with the condition of facilities. In response to his first request, Sport England has informed me that the services it has offered to the council can be tailored to provide a detailed local assessment. It is crucial that we provide sports facilities that are fit for the 21st century and that meet the needs of the communities whom they serve. I ask my hon. Friend to keep my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport informed of progress on the development of the updated strategy. I know that my right hon. Friend would be happy to discuss with Sport England what other options are available to assist local authorities in planning more effectively for sport.

On funding for new or upgraded swimming pool provision in Redcar and Cleveland, I understand that Sport England has had some early discussions with the local authority; I urge them to continue that dialogue. I am informed that the results of any new modelling would be only one factor in reaching a decision on the awarding of lottery funding for the area.

[Jim Fitzpatrick]

On my hon. Friend's second request, concerning planning issues, I very much endorse the view that planning policy statements can provide effective leadership in promoting the development and spread of sporting provision. Indeed, the planning policy guidance note on sport and recreation—PPG 17—does just that. It states:

"To ensure effective planning for open space, sport and recreation it is essential that the needs of local communities are known. Local authorities should undertake robust assessments of the existing and future needs of their communities for open space, sports and recreational facilities."

It goes on to say that local authorities should ensure that provision is made for local sports and recreational facilities where planning permission is granted for new developments, especially housing. It also establishes that planning obligations should be used as a means to remedy local deficiencies in the quantity or quality of open space, sports and recreational provision. In making use of planning obligations, it is essential that local authorities have undertaken detailed assessments of needs and audits of existing facilities, and set appropriate local standards in order to justify their use.

For Redcar and Cleveland, as my hon. Friend may be aware, Sport England has offered funding to the local authority to enable it to develop a supplementary planning document on planning obligations for sport and physical activity. That document would result in a framework for collecting developer contributions for sport and recreational provision from new development. Again, I would urge the local authority to take up that offer if it has not done so already.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport are in regular dialogue about how the planning system might be further enhanced in the better interests of sport. With regard to my hon. Friend's final request, I am confident that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport would be delighted to visit Guisborough pool to see the facility first hand.

If I may return to the national picture, it is clear that there are some very positive messages about swimming in this country, although we are under no illusions about the scale of the challenge in terms of providing better community facilities. But that has to start with local authorities ensuring that there is good local provision that meets the needs of all sections of their communities. I congratulate my hon. Friend on securing this debate on behalf of his constituents and the wider community.

Oral Answers to Questions

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Rugby League

1. Paul Rowen (Rochdale) (LD): If she will make a statement on the support her Department is giving to rugby league. [55617]

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): Before I answer that question, may I congratulate Alastair Cook on scoring a fantastic century out in India? I think that this is only the sixth time in the history of the fantastic game of cricket that anyone has scored a century and a 50 in their first test match. I also congratulate Shelley Rudman, our silver medallist in the winter Olympics, and the rest of the team. They did a fantastic job. I want to pay tribute to the talented athletes scholarship scheme money that Shelley Rudman received from the Government. That scheme was designed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State some 18 months ago. Silver today, gold tomorrow.

Rugby league's recent modernisation was led by its superb chief executive, Richard Lewis, and I can see the game going from strength to strength. It is one of Sport England's top 10 priority sports, which is why Sport England has recently invested £11.5 million to build on the recent renaissance of rugby league. If other sports looked at rugby league for an example of what can be achieved in modernising their governing bodies, they could learn a lesson or two.

Paul Rowen: In December 2004, the Minister announced the creation of the national sports foundation, and the allocation of £2.5 million for rugby league, but I understand that no money has yet been allocated. Will he explain why and tell the House when rugby league can expect to receive its share of the resources?

Mr. Caborn: That was £27 million of public money that the Chancellor had put into his Budget, and it will start to come on stream in April this year. The hon. Gentleman will know that we are still discussing with the national governing bodies and those involved in the regional structure how best we can dispense that money to get maximum value from it. I remind Opposition Members that this involves £27.5 million of public money, and it will start to come on stream in April. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will see rugby league getting its fair share.

Digital Television

2. Mr. Mark Lancaster (North-East Milton Keynes) (Con): If she will make a statement on the development of proposals for the Government's targeted assistance programme for digital switchover. [55619]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I hope that my departmental questions will continue to provide the political highlight in this place that they have done today. I should like to begin by extending the congratulations of the whole House to our British Oscar winners: Rachel Weisz; Nick Park and Steve Box; and Martin McDonagh. They are examples of the excellence of the British film industry and they all deserve our praise.

Ofcom will shortly publish data showing that the proportion of households with a digital television has now reached 70 per cent. That is an important landmark. We must now ensure that the principle of universal free-to-view television continues, and, to ensure that no one is left behind, we will provide specific help to the very elderly and disabled who are at most risk. The nature of the assistance will be heavily influenced by the trial that is under way in Bolton. This underlines our Government's commitment that the most vulnerable will not be excluded from the benefits of a digital society.

Mr. Lancaster: I am grateful to the Minister for her reply. It is a special pleasure to see her here today, and I mean that genuinely. Is she aware of the special problems that Milton Keynes has in regard to the switchover? The city planners decided that individual houses did not need an aerial. Instead, they provided a central feed from an analogue mast. Furthermore, some houses have deeds that prohibit them from erecting an aerial. In the light of that, the changeover to digital in Milton Keynes will be especially problematic, although many people view it as an opportunity to get broadband, which they cannot get at the moment. As Milton Keynes is a unique case, would the Minister be prepared to meet people there to discuss the way forward?

Tessa Jowell: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his kindness and for his remarks of concern about his constituents. I am happy to meet constituents from Milton Keynes to discuss this specific issue, but he should be reassured that Digital UK is already in discussion with Milton Keynes council in relation to the specific problem that arises from the reliance on analogue cable. He can assure his constituents that Freeview will be available to them, as will the continued roll-out of broadband.

Mr. Pat McFadden (Wolverhampton, South-East) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State accept that many pensioners in particular are worried about not just the technology involved in digital switchover, but not having access to the many new channels and radio channels provided in that way? What is her Department doing not just to help pensioners with the technology, but to ensure that, as we move to that new technology, neither pensioners nor anyone else loses out on the expansion of choice in broadcasting that this entails?

Tessa Jowell: My hon. Friend makes my point precisely in relation to the importance of universal free-to-view access for digital television. He makes a second important point about the distinction between the need for information and the need of elderly and vulnerable people for equipment. That is the information that we are seeking to develop in the Bolton trial. The early indications are that the greatest need is for information on how to use digital technology. We will ensure that the service meets the needs of individuals so that no one is left behind.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that surveys already show that a large number of people, not just pensioners, struggle with digital technology and that it will be just as important to provide help to the socially isolated as to the financially disadvantaged? Will she confirm that, as part of the assistance programme, she will provide financial help to voluntary groups so that they can be trained to give the help that will be extremely important to all those who would otherwise struggle to benefit from the switchover?

Tessa Jowell: I can confirm that for the hon. Gentleman. It is an important point and one that no doubt will be reflected in his Select Committee's report, when it is published, on the impact of digital switchover, but voluntary organisations have an important part to play, street by street, in identifying those people who are at risk of being left out through not understanding or not having access to the relevant equipment. We intend to address that in the way he suggests.

Alison Seabeck (Plymouth, Devonport) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that her Department will press those responsible for providing the hardware necessary to take the digital change to ensure that the buttons are large enough for people with visual impairment to see them and for people with arthritic hands to use them? There is a real concern here.

Tessa Jowell: Yes, my hon. Friend makes an important point about the practical impact of switchover, and yes, we are taking serious account of that—talking to the manufacturers through Digital UK, which will produce guidelines with advice on this.

Gambling Premises

3. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West) (Con): What measures she is taking to increase the number of licensed gambling premises. [55620]

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): Parliament took the decision to limit the number of regional casinos in the first phase to one, and we are implementing the legislation on that basis. We do not rule out the possibility of asking Parliament to approve an increase in the number of regional casinos, but the impetus for any change will not come from the Government and we have no plans to return to Parliament on this issue.

May I again underline the fact that the new legislation is about new protections, not new casinos? The implementation of the Gambling Act 2005 will ensure that all gambling premises, including casinos, are subject to tough but fair regulation by the Gambling Commission and the local licensing authorities.

Mr. Swayne: Will the Minister therefore rule out the possibility of increasing the number to eight?

Mr. Caborn: As I said, we are prepared to consider doing that if the House decides that it wants to move there. I repeat that the Act has achieved everything that the Government wanted to achieve—that is, dealing with online gambling and remote gambling. We believe we have done that. If there has to be any change on regional casinos, it will be done through a consensus in the House. As I said in an Adjournment debate last week, it is for the Opposition parties to come forward and probably resurrect the amendments they tabled in Committee, when they were asking for four.

Mr. John McFall (West Dunbartonshire) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Minister agree that the debate last week was enlightening, but that the original pilot, focusing on one super-casino, is deficient? We need a pilot focusing on different parts of the country so that we can have more than one casino, which would reflect the social and economic factors in different communities.

Mr. Caborn: I entirely agree. That is why the Government proposed that there should be eight casinos. Just before the election, however, the Opposition in their wisdom decided to reduce the number to one. We conceded that, because in doing so we secured the Act that we wanted, which protected the vulnerable and, especially, children from remote and internet gambling in particular. That was the purpose and the core of our Bill, and the question of casinos was subsidiary to it. If there is a wish for the number to be increased to any number between one and eight, we are prepared to consider that, but the Opposition parties will have to indicate their support.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): May I remind the House that the scrutiny Committee suggested no limit on the number of regional casinos and said that they would bring about massive regeneration? As for the growth of gambling, does the Minister concede that, although children are banned from gambling premises, the growth of e-gaming and, before long, mobile telephony will cause problems? How does he intend to ensure that remote gambling is well regulated and that a proper regulatory framework governs those who gain access to such sites, in Europe or even in countries outside the European economic area?

Mr. Caborn: As we all know, the hon. Gentleman chaired the Committee that scrutinised the Gambling Bill. He did so very ably and he has raised an important point. Yes, under the Act we have taken power to control remote and internet gambling, to the extent that a member state can do that. We intend to call a conference of Ministers responsible for gambling law in various countries to establish whether international regulation is a possibility. I agree that children and vulnerable people are being exposed to a new kind of gambling, or mechanism for gambling, that will be difficult to control unless there is international recognition in the form of regulation. We will call the international conference within the next few months.

Sir Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough) (Lab): Surely the issue of regional casinos does not just concern licensed gambling. It is also about job creation and investment in local communities. Ought there not to be investment in hotels, shops and so forth in the vicinity of casinos? Will the Government be a little more affirmative in launching their crusade for eight casinos, even if the full support of the Opposition is not forthcoming?

Mr. Caborn: As we said throughout the Bill's passage, we wanted eight casinos, small or large, in eight regions to test the social impact on the community. We agree about the possibility of regeneration, but I repeat that it was Opposition Members who reduced the number from eight to one before the election, and it is for them to act. [Interruption.] We are not so naive that we do not know what wash-up is all about just before an election. It was the Opposition who forced the Government to reduce the number from eight to one. Let the poker faces opposite put their cards on the table. It was they who tabled an amendment in Committee providing for four casinos and then reneged on it because their leader thought it politically expedient for them to do so. They know that, we know that and the country knows that.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): On the one hand, the Minister's Department has overlooked a loophole in the law that has allowed a proliferation of casinos under the old Act. On the other hand, they dither about increasing the number of casinos in the pilot under the new Act. Why is that? The Secretary of State said last April that she reserved the right to revisit the number of regional casinos in the pilot and, indeed, under section 175(8) of the Act, she has the power to increase the number to the eight that the Minister so clearly wants. It is disingenuous of him to say that that requires the support of the whole House when an hour and a half's debate on a statutory instrument in Committee would do the trick. Why does he not get on with it?

Mr. Caborn: As the old saying has it, when you are digging a hole, chuck the blooming shovel away. That is exactly what the Opposition are doing: they are digging themselves into a bigger and bigger hole.

Yes, there will be an increase in the number of casinos provided for in the Gaming Act 1968. We have set a final date of 28 April for applications. For the record, we are talking about 54 permitted areas. We are not talking about the whole of the United Kingdom. As the hon. Gentleman knows, that is covered by the 1968 Act. I go back to the point: if the hon. Gentleman wants to move from one to eight, we will be prepared to do that. I repeat that we got everything that we wanted out of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I think that there has been a bit too much repetition on that matter.

BBC Charter

4. Kitty Ussher (Burnley) (Lab): What mechanisms the Government plan to use as part of charter renewal to promote quality broadcasting by the BBC; and if she will make a statement. [55621]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): The insistence on quality for the BBC is important for many reasons, not the least of which is that it was that which the public insisted on most consistently and vociferously in the unprecedented public consultation that we have undertaken as part of charter review. I will publish the BBC White Paper very shortly. It will set out a number of ways, developed from the Green Paper, in which we will ensure consistency and high-quality programming as part of the trademark of the BBC.

Kitty Ussher: I thank my right hon. Friend for that extremely helpful response. As she continues to lead her Department into the future with her characteristic vigour, will she undertake to involve BBC staff and trade unions in the development of the White Paper and the charter renewal process?

Tessa Jowell: I thank my hon. Friend for that question. I certainly will undertake to do that. Last week, we met the BBC trade unions to discuss the White Paper and the kind of changes that would be necessary within the BBC, which is a matter for the BBC governors and the BBC Trust. The involvement of the trade unions is an important part of the BBC being fit for the next charter review period.

Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): Will the Secretary of State join me in praising the BBC for delivering a unique service, not only providing quality programming but delivering a large audience? Does she agree, however, that there should not be pressures on the licence fee driving it upwards? Will the White Paper make it clear that no Government initiative will force the BBC to have an ever increasing licence fee?

Tessa Jowell: The hon. Gentleman sets a series of potential traps in his question. It is established Government policy and part of the manifesto that digital switchover will take place between 2008 and 2012. We have also guaranteed protection and help for the most vulnerable. That is Government policy. The funding of that policy will be met through the licence fee, which in the Green Paper I indicated would continue throughout the next charter review period. That is a broadcasting cost and should be met by broadcasting income.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield) (Lab/Co-op): If we are really interested in quality journalism and quality broadcasting, will my right hon. Friend encourage the BBC to ensure that all journalists see a film that was nominated for but did not win an Oscar last night, "Good Night, and Good Luck"? It shows an age 50 years ago when journalists and television stations had the integrity, courage, independence and honesty to take on witch hunts and to face them down.

Tessa Jowell: There is a bit more intrigue. I absolutely agree. "Good Night, and Good Luck" concluded the excellent London film festival this year. At that time, there was not much optimism that it would be distributed more widely. My hon. Friend is right. A BBC confident in its journalistic independence, seeking out truth, sits at the heart of our democracy and we all here have a duty to support that.

Steve Webb (Northavon) (LD): The Secretary of State rightly mentioned that an essential feature of quality public service broadcasting is political independence. What changes does she envisage will be made to the BBC's governance structure to reinforce its independence of Government?

Tessa Jowell: Very simply, changes will be made to get rid of the existing and long-established dual responsibilities of the BBC governors for both the regulation of the BBC and for overseeing the management of the BBC, and to establish the BBC Trust, which will be responsible and accountable to the licence fee payer. The BBC is a unique organisation and it needs a unique form of governance to deliver its responsibilities. Its responsibilities are to the people who pay for it—the licence fee payers, the people of this country.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the BBC will be more likely to achieve quality if it competes on fair terms with commercial broadcasting, rather than on favoured terms? With that in mind, where are we with the proposal to require market impact assessments of proposed new BBC services, and of significant changes to existing ones?

Tessa Jowell: I agree with my hon. Friend up to a point. The BBC's existence as an organisation with an annual turnover in excess of £3 billion is an intervention in the market. We in this country do not have a broadcasting system that is determined simply by competition and the market—a fact that reflects a long-standing public consensus, which will continue. That said, it is important that the BBC's impact on the wider market, which generates choice and innovation for viewers and wealth for this country, be kept under review. As he rightly says, the rigour of market impact assessments is a very important way of determining whether the BBC proceeds in the public interest with a given decision at a particular time, and that will be very clearly set out in the forthcoming White Paper.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): May I express my delight at the explosion of interest in the deliberations of this Department? I hope that we can look forward to similar interest in future. Although I understand that this must be a difficult time personally for the Secretary of State, we must not allow recent events to interfere with the running of her Department. The process of renewal of the BBC's charter is complex and involves billions of pounds of taxpayers' money. In such negotiations, what is needed above all else is transparency, accountability and credibility. How, therefore, does she answer the charge of the House of Lords Select Committee dealing with this issue that her "proposals for reforming the governance and regulation of the BBC are confusing, misguided and unworkable"?

Tessa Jowell: I take the House of Lords' judgment on this issue very seriously indeed, and when the hon. Gentleman reads the proposals—they will be published shortly in the White Paper—he will see, I hope, that we have taken account of the views of the Lords and of others who have commented on the new BBC trust structure. But I come back to the essential point: the BBC is a unique organisation in this country and it is not like any other plc. The BBC belongs to the people of this country, and it must have an accountable and transparent governance structure that reflects that relationship. We will ensure that it does.

Mr. Swire: Indeed, but Ofcom has criticised the Government's failure fully to address the future of public service broadcasting, while the BBC itself fears that the Secretary of State's plans understate the importance of the digital future. Industry speculation suggests that there is absolutely no difference between her original proposals—made six months ago—and those in the forthcoming White Paper to which she has just alluded. If so, how can we be confident that she and her Department have been addressing the very serious issues at stake here?

Tessa Jowell: Very often, it is better to address the facts rather than the speculation, and I can promise the hon. Gentleman that, once published, the White Paper proposals will reflect that considered judgment on precisely the issues that he raises.

Newspaper Distribution

5. James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): What discussions she has had with the Office of Fair Trading and the Department of Trade and Industry on the distribution arrangements for newspapers and magazines. [55622]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (James Purnell): None, although officials at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport have had such a discussion. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the chairman of the Office of Fair Trading on 12 October 2005, pointing out that serious concern had been expressed about how a different system could protect plurality and serve the public. She asked the OFT to give these concerns appropriate weight in reaching its conclusions.

James Brokenshire: I am grateful for that confirmation of the representation that the Secretary of State made, as I believe that she shares my serious concerns that, if the Office of Fair Trading confirms its original opinion, it will have a significant impact on the industry, including retailers, magazine distributors and newspaper titles, and will also affect the wider public interest. What further steps will the Department take in the event that the OFT either confirms its previous draft opinion or fails to provide the industry with sufficient legal certainty and Ministers at the Department of Trade and Industry continue to sit on their hands?

James Purnell: The hon. Gentleman has been energetic in pursuing this issue. It is a matter of cross-party consensus that it is important to have an effective and independent competition regime, and we do not propose to change that. The OFT will have heard the concerns that he and other hon. Members have expressed and will make its decision in due course.

Music (Young People)

6. Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): What steps her Department is taking to encourage young people to become involved in music; and if she will make a statement. [55623]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): The Department for Culture, Media and Sport continues to work closely with the Department for Education and Skills to set out a shared vision for music education in the music manifesto. That will take place over the next five years and central to it is the involvement of young people in music education.

Mr. David: My hon. Friend will be aware that Wales is a musical nation—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I will not burst into song. Will there be any initiatives in Wales to promote music to young people?

Mr. Lammy: Wales is of course a musical nation and Welsh miners valley music is second only to gospel music in huge achievement. I know that my hon. Friend is an oboist of world class status, having played for the Glamorgan youth orchestra. I hope that he is pleased with the work that the music manifesto is taking forward and also with the work of Youth Music, which is ensuring that money goes in particular to our poorest estates and most deprived areas to get those children engaged in music.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): I congratulate the Minister and his wife on the birth of their son.

If the Minister is so keen on involving young people in music, why do the Government's targets for attending arts events include classical music, jazz and opera, but exclude the very type of musical events that young people are likely to attend? Why, for example, does the target exclude attending urban music, rock music or world music events? Are not the Government totally out of touch with young people?

Mr. Lammy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He knows that we consulted closely with the Arts Council in setting that target, but we keep it under review and it is right that we look at all the art forms that can contribute to participation by young people.

John Donne (Portrait)

7. Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): If she will intervene to ensure that the portrait of John Donne in the National Portrait Gallery is not lost to the nation. [55624]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Mr. David Lammy): If the National Portrait Gallery cannot raise funds to purchase the portrait, I have no power to intervene in its sale to another party, as it is private property. However, if it is sold to an overseas buyer, it will be subject to the normal export licensing procedures.

Chris Bryant: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is a uniquely British portrait? It is a painting of one of Britain's greatest poets, a man who was a priest in the Church of England and a Member of this House. He was also Dean of St. Paul's and wrote that great first definition of socialism:

"No man is an Island, entire of it self".

Will he do everything in his power to ensure that the present owners of the painting, who include the family of the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram), perhaps lower their price, to ensure that it remains in this country?

Mr. Lammy: There can be no doubt that John Donne is one of our great poets, but it is right and proper that we see how the process goes forward. The decision may ultimately come to me so I should not comment beforehand.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Although I understand the Minister's reluctance to comment in detail and thank him for what he did over the Canalettos, will he bear in mind that the bell is tolling for our great galleries unless they have proper purchase grants for acquisitions, which they do not at the moment?

Mr. Lammy: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Heritage Lottery Fund has funded £130 million-worth of acquisition purchases over the last 10 years. Of course, in the case involving John Donne, there is a bid before the National Heritage Memorial Fund as well. It is right that we have been able to acquire great works of art and keep them in this country. I have been able to make certain assessments once a decision has been reached by the reviewing panel, so let us wait and see what happens in this case.

Mr. Siôn Simon (Birmingham, Erdington) (Lab): May I remind the Minister and the Secretary of State of the words of John Donne about ephemeral excitements—

"These burning fits but meteors be

Whose matter in thee is soon spent"— and suggest that that which is durable, valuable and important not be sacrificed to that which is cheap, easy and immediate, and that that national treasure indeed be saved for the nation?

Mr. Lammy: I commend my hon. Friend on his recollection of John Donne and agree entirely.

National Lottery

8. Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): What proportion of funds awarded by the Big Lottery Fund in 2004–05 went to the four original good causes. [55625]

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): The comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Simon) show that those who do not attend the Chamber regularly miss an educational and cultural experience.

The Big Lottery Fund is the operating name of the National Lottery Charities Board and the New Opportunities Fund, until the National Lottery Bill goes through Parliament. They work together. Both bodies continue to distribute funding solely within their existing good cause areas, so one third is distributed to the original good causes of charitable expenditure, and two thirds to the new good causes of environment, health and education introduced by the Government in 1998.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Why have the Government abandoned the additionality principle, whereby lottery funds are supposed to be in addition to taxpayer funds and not a substitute for them? Will the Minister comment specifically on the latest annual report of the Big Lottery Fund, which shows funding to, for instance, school learning and child care and cancer and stroke treatment, which are Government responsibilities? Is not he ashamed that the Government have plundered the lottery fund in that way, in defiance of the principle on which the national lottery was founded—at that time with Labour party agreement?

Mr. Caborn: In taking the Bill through Parliament over the past few months, there has been a background of wide consultation with the British public as to what they actually want lottery money to be spent on and how additionality can be justified. The results of the consultations, which are on the public record and have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses, showed clearly that the public wanted that money to be spent on health and education. We have held discussions with all the distributing bodies and I hope that in their annual reports they will give account of additionality for their funds—the first time that we have been able to do that. The distributing bodies will be accountable through their annual reports, which have been deposited in both Houses of Parliament. If parliamentarians want to put questions, in the many ways available to them, it is open to them to do so.

Mr. Gordon Marsden (Blackpool, South) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government and the Secretary of State were absolutely right to broaden the terms as they did? Arts and education need to be brought together and the issues cannot be pigeonholed as the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) seemed to suggest.

Mr. Caborn: Absolutely, and that is what came from the wide consultation that took place. The lottery is a fantastic institution. It is probably one of the best lotteries in the world, and credit is due to the Opposition and to John Major in particular for introducing it. We need to continue to refresh it and to consult the public, which we are doing, and the proof of the pudding is in the eating in that people are still playing the lottery and, as I say, it is one of the best lotteries in the world, so the public must have confidence in what we are doing.

Daniel Kawczynski (Shrewsbury and Atcham) (Con): I should like to inform the Minister that the new MRI scanner at the Royal Shrewsbury hospital was paid for by the national lottery, because the local consultants put in a bid. I am very grateful to them for securing that money, but should not the MRI scanner have been paid for by the Secretary of State for Health?

Mr. Caborn: The answer is no, and this is the difficulty—[Interruption.] When we consulted the public generally, across the board, health was one of the issues where they believed that lottery funds can be additional to that which is spent in other ways. Quite honestly, when we are talking about investing in the health service, no one can accuse this Government of not doing so. We are spending more money on the health service than that lot on the Conservative Benches ever did when they were in power, and this money is additional to that expenditure.

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): On the same point, does my right hon. Friend agree that the provision of hospices and MRI scanners, which would have taken many years of fundraising, are worthwhile areas of lottery funding and that another area of equal worth would be the provision of cancer drugs—such as herceptin, cetuximab and temozolomide—while they are awaiting NICE approval?

Mr. Caborn: Although we have laid out the broad principles about such money and investment, particularly in the new National Lottery Bill on the new lottery fund, the distribution of lottery funds is undertaken by independent bodies, which are at arm's length—[Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) is not trying to bring into disrepute the integrity of the members of the lottery distributing boards. I say very genuinely that the public can have confidence in the distributing boards. They are made up of independent people of integrity who operate to terms of reference and do a fantastic job in distributing that money fairly and in a transparent way throughout the country. Additionality can be brought to Parliament through the annual reports of the distributing bodies.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): The reverse side of that argument is that, since the creation of the New Opportunities Fund in 1998, more than £3 billion, according to the national lottery website, has been removed from sport, arts, heritage and charities. Given that it is exactly eight months to the day since we won the bid in Singapore, how can the Government deliver on the many commitments made at the time of the bid to elite athletes, and about mass participation and a cultural festival if sport and the arts have suffered a de facto cut of £1.5 billion?

Mr. Caborn: I do not accept that. Some £750 million has come from the New Opportunities Fund—now the Big Lottery Fund—to invest in school sports facilities throughout the country. That is true right across the board. Lottery money is now being invested with much more value added than previously, when it was very siloed. The British public were telling us very clearly that they want us to take an holistic approach, not one that is departmentalised in the way that the previous Administration had us do it.

9. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When she next expects to meet representatives of the Big Lottery Fund to discuss lottery grants to village halls and community centres. [55626]

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Minister for Sport (Mr. Richard Caborn): That was a resounding expression of confidence in the hon. Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham).

To date the lottery has awarded £258 million to village and community halls. The Big Lottery Fund will make £50 million available over three years through a community buildings programme to benefit projects across England. I have no plans to meet its representatives to discuss that at present.

Mr. Bellingham: Has the Minister seen a recent report that revealed a £400 million backlog of repairs to village halls across the country? He mentioned the Big Lottery Fund making available £50 million over the next four years, but what hope can he hold out to village halls in my constituency, including the one at Terrington St. John, which has twice had its bid turned down? Is there not a danger, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) pointed out, that we are seeing substitution for Government expenditure and not enough money being spent on good causes in rural areas?

Mr. Caborn: I do not think that that is true. In an Adjournment debate a few weeks ago, the investment of £50 million in village halls was welcomed. I have not read the report about the £400 million, but if the hon. Gentleman sends me a copy, I will read it and then write to him and put my reply in the Libraries of both Houses. Through the Millennium Commission and what we are doing now through the Big Lottery Fund, the investment in village halls and community halls is at a level that is commensurate with the role that they play in communities.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Dioceses

20. Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): What assessment the commissioners have made of the financial implications of the proposals to reduce the number of dioceses. [55637]

The Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): There is a draft Dioceses, Pastoral and Mission Measure which would enable a new dioceses commission to bring forward proposals for reducing the number of dioceses. Since the Measure is in draft, it follows that the commissioners have not made any assessment of the financial implications.

Mark Pritchard: I am grateful for the commissioner's response. When the assessment phase comes along, will he convey my concern that we should retain the dioceses of Herefordshire and Lichfield and recognise the valuable work of the suffragan bishops, the Bishop of Shrewsbury and the Bishop of Ludlow? The dioceses are historical and I hope that they will be safeguarded in any future changes in England and Wales.

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful for that. The hon. Gentleman's remarks will be passed on to the appropriate commissioners. He should bear it in mind that the Church of England has 45 dioceses—43 of which contain more than 13,000 parishes—covering all of England, the Isle of Man, the Channel Islands, the Isles of Scilly and a little bit of Wales, so he is in good company.

Slave Trade Abolition (Commemoration)

21. Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): What budget the commissioners have identified for the Church of England's commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the Abolition of the Slave Trade Act 1807. [55638]

Sir Stuart Bell: The Church of England is heavily involved in the ecumenical "Set all free" project, which will include publications and a major service at Westminster abbey. The commissioners are not contributing financially to marking the bicentenary.

Chris Bryant: May I urge the commissioners to contribute? The Church of England was very involved in passing the 1807 Act, even though there was some hypocrisy. The Bishop of Exeter kept 655 slaves until the time of the Abolition of Slavery Act 1833, when he received £12,700 in compensation. Will the Church Commissioners put a little more oomph into the celebration so that we can see an end to humbug in the Church?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He goes back to 1807; shortly, we will have a question that relates to the next century—the Church certainly has a wide span. He will note that the Synod recently called on Her Majesty's Government to give the highest priority to enabling legislation to bring an end to the causes and outcomes of slavery. Personally, I presume that the Synod will equally accept the enabling legislation for the Church to accept women bishops in line with his ten-minute Bill.

Israel (Investments)

22. Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) (Con): What representations the commissioners have received on their policy on investment in Israel. [55639]

Sir Stuart Bell: The commissioners do not have a blanket policy on investment in Israel. The hon. Gentleman is referring to a recent resolution from the General Synod which might be construed as a representation to the commissioners. As the Archbishop of Canterbury has said, there has been much adverse comment on the resolution. The archbishop has accepted that this has caused much distress and he has described this as a cause of deep regret.

Mr. Gibb: I am reassured by that answer, which is a million miles away from the anti-Israeli attitude demonstrated by the General Synod. Does that not show how out of touch and extreme elements of the General Synod have become? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that in these times of growing anti-Semitism across Europe, the Church of England should concentrate on promoting the Christian message, rather than fuelling anti-Semitism through politically motivated anti-Israeli motions that are more redolent of 1970s student unions than serious and compassionate policy making?

Sir Stuart Bell: In the words of the Scripture, those who have ears, let them hear. However, the Synod did not resolve to disinvest in companies dealing with Israel, nor has it the power to do so.

Cemeteries

23. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What assessment has been made of the requirement for new churchyard cemeteries in the next century? [55640]

Sir Stuart Bell: As I indicated earlier, the Church takes a long view, but since we are hardly into the sixth year of the present century it follows that the Church has not made any assessment for new churchyard cemeteries in the next.

Mr. Prentice: That was a disappointing reply. There is a grave shortage. Is my hon. Friend aware that in inner London the supply of land is virtually exhausted, and that by the end of the century there will be nowhere to bury people in outer London? What is the view of the Church Commissioners on the possibility of burying people one on top of another? Are there any theological reservations about that?

Sir Stuart Bell: I always enjoy a question from my hon. Friend. I am sure that he does not mind a jocular response from me from time to time. The duty to provide a place of burial lies with the secular authority. The operation and management of Church of England burial grounds is a matter for individual parochial church authorities. No central records are kept. Clearly, the matter that the hon. Gentleman raises is an important one, and it will be taken seriously by the Church.

Historic Ecclesiastical Buildings

24. Michael Fabricant (Lichfield) (Con): What discussions the commissioners have had on the merits of educating visitors to cathedrals and historic ecclesiastical buildings on the costs of maintaining them. [55641]

Sir Stuart Bell: The commissioners support the Church Heritage Forum statement "Building Faith in Our Future", which examines not only the immense benefit these buildings bring to the nation but also the cost of their upkeep.

Michael Fabricant: The hon. Gentleman may recall that we discussed this issue in the House a month ago. I inadvertently told him that most people volunteer to give the full amount that is being asked by cathedrals when people visit them. It seems that the practice in Lichfield is that more than half the people visiting the cathedral choose to pay nothing. Of the £4 that is asked of them, an average of only 80p is given by the half who do pay something. Will the hon. Gentleman condemn this sort of scrooge-like behaviour? Does he agree that now is a particularly good time to visit Lichfield cathedral, given the discovery of the Lichfield angel, which was carved some 1,000 years ago and was recently found in immaculate condition? The angel is now on show.

Sir Stuart Bell: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not surprised to know that I also read Hansard. I read his point of order on 2 February, when he put the record straight. I know also that Mr. Deputy Speaker said that he would not comment on the hon. Gentleman's remarks. However, I should congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the fact that he is doing an excellent job advertising the special merits of Lichfield cathedral. I am sure that he is telling his constituents to see the recently excavated 18th century carving of the Lichfield angel.

Michael Fabricant: Eighth century.

Sir Stuart Bell: Indeed, 8th century, if that is not what I said.

The next time the hon. Gentleman is there, he may perhaps stand outside with a begging bowl and ask people to pay their dues.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): When my hon. Friend is next in contact with the cathedrals and dioceses throughout the country, will he encourage them not to be shy about charging entry to cathedrals given the evidence and experience at Westminster abbey, which is only a few yards away from this place, where the introduction of admission charges to discourage the use of the abbey as a clearing house for London tourist guides has been successful and has not reduced the number of people who genuinely want to visit one of the historic treasures of the United Kingdom?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He will be aware that cathedrals receive only £1 million per year in English Heritage grants although they generate £151 million in direct and indirect spending for their cities. Anyone who passes Westminster abbey any day of the week will testify to the popularity of the venue. It is one of the top tourist attractions in the city. In a sense, it charges, and it is a worthwhile charge. I would encourage other cathedrals to follow its example.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION COMMITTEE

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

Local Election Turnouts

25. Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): What assessment the Electoral Commission has made of the likely impact on voter turnout of the process of planning for the 2007 local authority elections. [55642]

Peter Viggers (Gosport): The Commission advises me that it has undertaken no such assessment and has no plans to do so. However, research into public attitudes to voting at this year's local elections in England is planned as part of the commission's ongoing research programme on public participation.

Mr. Holloboone: Does my hon. Friend share my concern, and will he convey my concern to the commission, that the Government's enthusiasm for the imminent reorganisation of local government could well impact on the electoral turnout in the 2007 elections if people are under the misapprehension that their vote will not be important because the authorities will not be around for that much longer?

Peter Viggers: Individuals would indeed be under a misapprehension if they thought that the Government had said that they intended to cancel the local government elections scheduled for 2007, as they have said no such thing. Decisions on local government governance are primarily a matter for the Government, although under current legislation the Secretary of State must seek the commission's advice before changing the structure of local government in any particular two-tier area.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to note that Liverpool has been identified as one of the areas where the Electoral Commission will conduct a pilot study to encourage voter turnout. Will that work include engaging with local communities?

Peter Viggers: I can confirm that it is the Government's intention to consult local government communities and other individuals, including local government figures and leading public bodies.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman share with the commission my view that a key reason for low turnout in local elections is the fact that many people do not believe that local councils have the power to address local needs, because a high proportion of the money spent by local councils comes from central Government with strings attached? Would it not be better if we increased the proportion of money spent and raised locally with a corresponding reduction in national income tax?

Peter Viggers: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point in his own way, but it would not be appropriate for me to enter into dialogue with him on the subject. However, he will agree that local government does indeed have considerable decision-making capacity, and I urge him to encourage others to vote in local government elections.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): May I ask the hon. Gentleman to ask the Electoral Commission to look at the reduction in the number of polling stations up and down the country over the years, as it could be a factor contributing to low turnouts, particularly at local elections?

Peter Viggers: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, and I shall certainly raise that issue with the Electoral Commission.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Redundant Churches

26. Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): How many churches have become redundant in the last three years; and what estimate he has made of the number likely to become redundant in 2006. [55643]

The Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): Seventy-four churches have been declared redundant in the last three years. The underlying annual figure for church closures is 25 to 30 and we have no evidence to suggest that the number of church closures in 2006 will exceed the norm.

Mr. Bone: Does the hon. Gentleman share the concern that I feel every time I see a church that is now a café or an office or, even worse, derelict? Will the Church Commissioners use every endeavour to save as many churches as possible?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. It is always a matter of sadness when a church closes but—I accept that the hon. Gentleman's question does not go as wide as this—many churches are opening. He may have an interest in St. Barnabas, Peterborough, which is an unlisted church that was closed two years ago. The city council proposes to acquire the building and curtilage for a wide variety of civic and community uses. The redundancy scheme providing for that was made yesterday, and we hope to complete the sale by the end of the month.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION COMMITTEE

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

Overseas Voters

27. Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): What steps the commission is taking to encourage greater participation of overseas voters at the next general election. [55644]

Peter Viggers (Gosport): The commission informs me that as the next general election approaches, it will again run a dedicated public awareness campaign to encourage eligible overseas residents to participate. The number of overseas voters registered doubled between 2004 and 2005, but I must add that the numbers registered remain extremely small.

Mr. Evans: Is not the fact that the number remains extremely small part of the problem? Helena Kennedy produced a report last week on the need to encourage more people to vote and, indeed, suggested lowering the age of eligibility to 16. Millions of people, however, are eligible to vote but do not know that they are, so we ought to spread the word now to encourage people to register. Indeed, we should make it far easier for people who are eligible to complete the process of registration.

Peter Viggers: There are some 15 million British citizens overseas, of whom a considerable number are eligible to register as they have lived overseas for fewer than 15 years. There are 45 constituencies without any overseas registered voters at all, but there are four overseas voters registered in the Ribble Valley constituency. If I were the hon. Member for Battersea (Martin Linton), with a majority of 163, I would contemplate the fact that 150 overseas voters are registered in that constituency. Individual Members may wish to take those facts and figures into account.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): Could the Commission advise Her Majesty's Revenue and Customs and the Department for Work and Pensions to tell British citizens overseas with whom they are in contact that they can register?

Peter Viggers: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office and other bodies have been assiduous. They have produced an overseas voter leaflet and distributed it in conjunction with the FCO, they have advertised in newspapers read by British citizens overseas, there has been public relations activity and information has been provided online, but I shall certainly consider the point raised by my hon. Friend.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, was asked—

Marriage

28. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): What proportion of the Church's central funds are allocated to marriage preparation and marriage support activities. [55645]

The Second Church Estates Commissioner (Sir Stuart Bell): The Church is a diverse body and much of the work on marriage preparation and support is provided through organisations and clergy and laity throughout the land. The Church nationally funds a marriage and family life adviser.

Andrew Selous: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that answer, and I particularly commend the support that I have received from the diocese of St. Albans and my own bishop, the Bishop of Bedford, in this important area, but can the hon. Gentleman tell the House what proportion of funding and what importance centrally the Church places on this aspect of its work?

Sir Stuart Bell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. The figures are not to hand, but I shall be glad to send them to him. I have, however, read with interest about the launch of a community marriage policy in the hon. Gentleman's constituency. His search for local volunteers to act as a couples mentor is welcomed, and he will know that he can find thousands of such mentors in the form of parish priests across the country.

Points of Order

3.31 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that you wanted to get through questions as quickly as possible, and indeed the second half have all been completed. May I, for the record, point out that there is another point of view in addition to that given by the Second Church Estates Commissioner, the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Sir Stuart Bell) at Question 22? There was no opportunity for that point of view to be expressed, but it should be said that many of us are deeply concerned at the demolition of properties in the occupied territories.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The hon. Gentleman is a sufficiently experienced Member of the House to know that he must not continue the debate under the guise of a point of order. I was quite aware of the importance of the matter, but equally, the balance of questions between the two hon. Gentlemen answering was such that I wanted to try to ensure that the Member representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission was reached, so that those questions could be put.

Ms Celia Barlow (Hove) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. One week ago today, my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) raised a point of order about the visit by three Liberal Democrat MPs to his constituency without prior notice. You ruled that it is customary that when hon. Members visit another's constituency for political reasons, they notify that Member in advance. The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Chris Huhne) visited my constituency, Hove and Portslade, last month and attended St. Patrick's night shelter, which currently has funding difficulties. I have been in correspondence with all the parties concerned with the shelter. It is a sensitive local issue, which I consider highly unsuitable to become a political football in an uninspiring leadership campaign. Will you raise awareness of the rule among hon. Members? After last Thursday's result, the hon. Gentleman might find it opportune to spend more time in his own constituency, rather than in mine.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can only say to the hon. Lady what Mr. Speaker has said on many occasions and what I said most recently: it is a general courtesy between Members that when they visit another constituency for political purposes, prior notification should be given. We are all on an equal basis in the House and we should all respect each other's rights in relation to our constituencies. That is on the record again. Hopefully, hon. Members read Hansard.

Orders of the Day

Police and Justice Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

3.33 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Charles Clarke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The central objective of the Bill is to help build safer communities, and the Bill seeks to do that in two ways—first, by taking forward our agenda for delivering real, sustained and lasting reforms to the police service in various ways, and secondly, by helping to create a modern culture of respect based on the needs, rights and responsibilities of the law-abiding majority, by implementing key measures in the respect action plan launched by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in January.

Working with the police service and its community safety partners, we have made significant strides in reducing crime in the past nine years in government, and I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the police service and its partners, which can be justifiably proud of their record of achievement. However, more needs to be done. Crime and antisocial behaviour are still too high, and public expectations around quality of service are quite properly rising and need to be properly met by all public services, including the police. Further reform of the police is necessary, and the Bill includes measures for reconfiguring the police service to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

The primary task of the police service is, and will remain, to prevent, deter, detect and reduce crime and antisocial behaviour. To achieve that end, we must first embed neighbourhood policing, which is central to every part of the proposal, in every community with improved police responsiveness and customer focus. Secondly, we must further modernise the police work force so that it is fully equipped to meet those challenges, which involve building an effective policing team between the police service and those who work with it. Thirdly, we must ensure greater involvement by communities in determining how they are policed.

The Bill will contribute to these goals by ensuring that we have the right structures in place to deliver sustained improvements in performance, that the accountability framework for police forces and their community safety partners is robust and responds to the voice of the citizen and that the police and community support officers have the powers that they need to tackle crime and antisocial behaviour effectively.

The Bill will impact on each of the five tiers of policing—neighbourhood policing, the borough, which is the basic command unit level, the strategic force, the national policing institutions and internationally—and drive forward our modernisation proposals.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that one of the central points of the proposal is a partnership between local communities and the police? In particular, we must ensure that young people have a good relationship with the police, which means providing them with good local facilities. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety visited Leicester on Friday, when she saw such facilities, which are key to building a strong and positive relationship between young people and the police.

Mr. Clarke: As my hon. Friend has said, that partnership is central to the proposal. When we fight crime, it is not simply a matter for the police—it is a matter for the police working with every agency concerned. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety has told me about her visit and how impressed she was by what is happening. Better youth facilities are a key factor.

Mr. Jim Cunningham (Coventry, South) (Lab): I note that my right hon. Friend has made tremendous progress in certain areas in the fight against crime. However, will he clarify the situation in the west midlands, where we are getting mixed signals about the transitional costs of amalgamation? Are West Midlands police and the other police forces wholly behind the change?

Mr. Clarke: The Bill does not specifically concern the force amalgamations in the west midlands to which my hon. Friend referred. West Midlands police, Staffordshire police and Warwickshire police are strongly in favour of the change, and West Mercia police is not, which is why I gave notice last week that I intend to lay an order in four months' time to bring about that change following the proper statutory period of consultation.

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): One reason why West Mercia police is not in favour of the proposal to amalgamate into a larger force is that market towns such as Shifnal, Newport and Wellington in my constituency will experience less neighbourhood policing rather than more neighbourhood policing. The chief of police will be in Birmingham rather than in the next-door county, which is the current situation.

Mr. Clarke: That perception is utterly wrong. When a major issue such as a tragic murder arises in a small police force area such as that of West Mercia police, the only way to deal with the matter effectively is to move people from the neighbourhood level. The development of strategic policing is central to the proposal.

The development of neighbourhood-level policing is at the centre of every change made in the Bill and in the reorganisation of police forces that was mentioned in the previous two interventions. What really matters to people is how crime and disorder are tackled in their own neighbourhoods. Issues as basic as abandoned cars, discarded syringes, truanting children drinking in local open spaces, graffiti and antisocial behaviour are absolutely central and put at the top of the agenda the method of policing that is at the core of the Bill.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I will not give way for the moment.

This means instilling a modern culture of respect at the neighbourhood level. The respect action plan set out a package of practical measures, which the Bill takes forward, to address the issue head on.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I will give way in a moment, as is my practice, but I shall make some more progress before doing so.

The Bill establishes a standard set of powers for police community support officers. We believe that their introduction has been a success and that taking that forward with a standard set of powers will enhance and develop that. Since their inception in the Police Reform Act 2002, community support officers have undertaken a variety of uniformed patrol tasks. Their high visibility has had a positive impact on reassurance in public places. They are accessible to communities and are key deliverers of neighbourhood policing. It is a unique role, distinct from that of a police officer. I am pleased that there is now recognition on both sides of the House of the true value of CSOs. But if CSOs are to play a full part in neighbourhood policing teams, they need appropriate powers to deal with the day-to-day problems that they encounter on the street without necessarily having recourse to a police officer. Standardisation will also end the confusion felt by the public about what powers CSOs have in their local area.

CSOs' local knowledge of young people makes them well placed to play a valuable role in dealing with truancy. The Bill therefore provides chief officers with the option of designating that power to their CSOs.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: When I come to the end of the phase of my speech to do with neighbourhood policing, I will give way to Members who have comments or questions on that.

On parenting orders and contracts, we believe that effective parenting is one of the key drivers in preventing children from offending and engaging in antisocial behaviour. It is vital that the police and other crime reduction partners are supported at the local neighbourhood level by parents in creating a strong society based on mutual respect. In tackling poor parenting and providing proper support for families where it is needed, we must be aware that that is the best course of action, and we are investing substantial resources in that. In the very small number of cases where parents are not willing to engage, the Bill widens the range of agencies that can enter into parenting contracts and apply for parenting orders to secure the engagement of parents. Parenting orders are already highly successful where they are used by local authorities to combat truancy, and by youth offending teams. Youth offending teams successfully applied for 1,273 orders in the last financial year alone. The breach rate is low, and most parents subject to an order grow to value the support that they receive. Indeed, many wish that they had received such support earlier and make an articulate statement of that.

Finally in this section of my speech, I turn to conditional cautions. To tackle low-level crime and antisocial behaviour effectively, we need tools that bring rapid relief to communities and send a clear signal that such behaviour is unacceptable. Conditional cautions can be used for adult offenders who admit their guilt and are willing to comply with the conditions specified in the caution. They have already been operating successfully in six areas, starting in December 2004, and we anticipate implementing them across the country in the next 18 months. They can provide an appropriate response to low-level offending without a potentially lengthy court process and free up court time to deal with more complex cases.

The conditions that can be attached to a conditional caution are currently limited to direct rehabilitation or reparation. While those conditions have given good results, experience has shown that widening their scope would mean that conditional cautions could be used in more cases. The Bill will enable conditional cautions to involve the offender paying a fine or undertaking up to 20 hours of unpaid work—for example, making reparation to the community by clearing up litter from a park. In that way, offenders will be giving something back to the community, and more quickly and directly than if they had gone to court.

I will now pause for a moment to give way to one or two Members who wanted to ask questions.

Philip Davies (Shipley) (Con): Does the Home Secretary agree that neighbourhood policing is not just about community support officers and that local police stations also play an important part? West Yorkshire police recently proposed to close Bingley and Shipley police stations' public helpdesks to save money. Will the Home Secretary take action to safeguard local police stations that command widespread public support?

Mr. Clarke: Local policing is central to neighbourhood policing and other matters. One of the exciting things that is happening in many parts of the country—I believe that that includes West Yorkshire—is the opening of police facilities in a wide range of areas such as schools, shopping centres and so on. Chief constables must examine the overall policing presence in their community, including the existing stations, and determine the best way in which to make an impact on their local communities. Much of the police estate was built decades—sometimes even centuries—ago, and reconfiguring it to fit modern policing need is a key responsibility of the police in West Yorkshire or anywhere else. That is what they have to do, and they will do precisely that.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the remoteness of community safety partnerships is one of the weaknesses of the current system? In my constituency, excellent work is being done with neighbourhood policing but individual constituents approach me rather than their community safety partnership, about whose existence they know nothing, when a problem arises. What will the Bill do to solve the problem and make community safety partnerships more accountable?

Mr. Clarke: I shall deal specifically with that shortly because the coterminosity of the basic command unit and the local district council is critical. I accept my hon. Friend's implicit criticism—the performance of community safety partnerships has been patchy throughout the country. I could take him to some where genuinely outstanding work has been done in exactly the way that he would like, and to others where there has been a more desultory state of affairs. A key element of the Bill is strengthening the partnerships so that he and all hon. Members can have confidence that their local crime and disorder reduction partnership between the police and the local authorities works.

Mr. Peter Bone (Wellingborough) (Con): I welcome the initiative to put local policing at the centre of Government policy. Unfortunately, the reforms are having the opposite effect in Wellingborough because the senior police officer there will be moved next month to a neighbouring constituency, Kettering. I do not understand how that helps local policing.

Mr. Clarke: I cannot speak about the specific case that the hon. Gentleman mentions. However, we propose the reorganisation of police authorities to reduce the pressures that can lead to moving a particular, respected local police officer to another locality. The purpose of the Bill is to make matters work in the opposite direction.

Jeremy Wright (Rugby and Kenilworth) (Con): I understand the points that the Home Secretary makes about standardising powers for police community support officers. However, in Warwickshire, PCSOs are permitted to travel only by public transport, which significantly limits their effectiveness. Will he be cautious about extending their powers without extending the necessary training and equipment? He will understand that my constituents welcome PCSOs as an addition, but not as a replacement for full police officers.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman puts the matter correctly—PCSOs are an addition, not a replacement. The PCSOs have been brought into the service under the command of the police as an addition to police officers. Of course, they need the appropriate training to deal with their responsibilities.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): Any extension of powers for PCSOs will inevitably begin to impinge on police officers' training. The House of Commons needs to understand clearly what powers my right hon. Friend intends to give PCSOs, how they are different from ordinary police constables, and how we can be assured that they will not impinge on the duties of those who are properly trained.

Mr. Clarke: It is for that reason that the memorandum and guidance notes for the Bill set out in great detail precisely which powers will be held by PCSOs and which will not on the standardised basis. It is fair to say that many in the police, including some police officers, as well as some hon. Members, were sceptical about the merits of introducing PCSOs in 2002. However, it is also fair to say that that scepticism is now a great deal less. That is not to say that no issues remain to be resolved and I am sure that my hon. Friend will continue to raise them with her customary wit and humour, and I shall attempt to respond. However, I believe that PCSOs have made a major contribution and will continue to do so. We want to take that forward.

Mr. Philip Hollobone (Kettering) (Con): If the Home Secretary is going to stop short of giving the power of arrest to PCSOs, will he consider giving them the power to disperse? As the law stands, unless a specific area is designated as a dispersal zone, PCSOs have a great deal of difficulty supporting full-time police officers in dispersing a large crowd of unruly youths.

Mr. Clarke: That is a fair point that some PCSOs have raised with me directly from their personal experience. That is why we have set out a detailed schedule that will be debated in Committee. However, given the hon. Gentleman's contribution, I hope that he will acknowledge that setting things out in a clear way that runs across the country is the right thing to do. The House will decide how best to deal with the issue when we consider it in Committee.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way twice more before I make progress.

Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South) (Lab): I am delighted to hear my right hon. Friend say that the basic command unit and the local authority will remain in close partnership and that they will have a clear relationship with one another. But what about local residents? Am I reading the Bill correctly? Is it stating that if a persistent problem of antisocial behaviour continues to be unresolved by the police, the local authorities or the other partners, the residents will have the right to call those groups to account?

Mr. Clarke: The House will not be surprised to learn that my hon. Friend, as usual, has got it completely spot on and correct. I shall make further comments on the detail of how that will operate in my speech, but it is very important that every community feels that it can successfully deliver the action that is needed to clear up their community. The Bill will help to strengthen that.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I thank the Home Secretary for his courtesy in giving way again. He has already stressed in his speech the importance of maintaining the support of communities, but is he aware that, with regard to his proposed changes to police forces, all the methods that have been used so far to test public opinion in my county of Essex—telephone or internet polls organised by local newspapers and phone-ins to Essex radio stations—have shown overwhelming support for the retention of an Essex police force in its own right and very strong opposition to proposed mergers? If he really believes in keeping the support of communities, will he take that into account before any changes are announced in the east of England counties? Will he give us an assurance that the Essex force will be allowed to stand alone?

Mr. Clarke: We have already addressed this issue across the Floor of the House, and it is not a matter that is directly part of the Bill. As I said to the hon. Gentleman both across the Floor and privately, I will give him the guarantee that when we have proposals to make, we will make them and he can then comment on them.

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): I thank the Home Secretary for giving way again. I wanted to raise the issue of giving registered social landlords the ability to opt for parenting orders. Youth offending teams are very experienced in that regard and my concern is that registered social landlords might not be. What sort of training does he have in mind?

Mr. Clarke: There will certainly be clear guidance but, to be quite candid, I am sure that the hon. Lady will acknowledge that there are real issues for the major registered social landlords. We need to try to ensure that we can deal with those issues as well. That is why we have provided the power that is set out in the Bill, but she is right to say that we require proper guidance on how that power is used. We will set that out as we go through.

I now turn to the second level of policing—at the basic command unit and borough level. As I said in response to interventions, partnerships between BCUs and crime and disorder reduction partnerships are absolutely essential, and I think we can do more. The key partnership operates at that level, but it cannot operate effectively if it works across administrative boundaries. Police forces across the country have made excellent progress already in bringing BCU and local authority boundaries into line, so that there are now only three forces that have certain BCUs that are not aligned with local authority boundaries. However, that could be changed, which is why the Bill seeks to place BCUs on a statutory footing and requires their boundaries to be aligned with those of local authorities. It also makes it a matter for chief constables to consult with key partners before altering BCU boundaries.

We have established the whole process for crime and disorder reduction partnerships. Again, as I said in answer to interventions—I will not repeat it all now—we believe that amending the structure of partnerships to reflect the changed environment since 1998, reducing unnecessary bureaucracy, enabling better flows of information, implementing national standards to ensure the best working practices and improving the accountability arrangements for partnerships are, based on what we have learned since the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, the key means to improving the quality of the CDRPs. The purpose of the standards, among other things, will be to raise the profile of CDRPs with local authorities so that local communities can see that they are responding to their concerns and priorities.

We believe, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Ms Taylor) suggested in her intervention, that it will be necessary to ensure that the BCU commander and other senior representatives hold regular public sessions to help the public to hold them to account, and that local people themselves should be able to get action on community safety issues that are of concern to them. That is the reason for the community call for action that is provided for in clause 15. It will give people a way in which to trigger action on the community safety issues that are of particular concern to them. Ward councillors will be given greater powers to take up problems on behalf of their communities. I would expect that, where neighbourhood policing is working effectively, there will be little need to have recourse to the community call for action, but it is important that the mechanism to empower action exists as a backstop.

The third level of policing is the strategic police force. As the House knows, and as we have already discussed to some extent, we have already embarked on a process of restructuring to ensure that forces can effectively meet the challenges of the 21st century. Many of the provisions in the Bill are designed to ensure that the new strategic forces successfully reconfigure to deliver protective services to national standards and the public's expectations of responsive neighbourhood policing.

We want to continue to strengthen the role of police authorities, first by ensuring that their members have the skills and experience necessary to undertake this challenging role—that is not always the case—and secondly by conferring on authorities an express duty to hold the chief officer to account. We will also add further functions, such as a duty to promote diversity, by secondary legislation.

Intervention is sometimes necessary to improve performance. Therefore, in addition to measures to ensure that strategic forces are effectively held to account, the Bill also modifies the reserve powers of the Home Secretary of the day to intervene in an underperforming force or police authority. I should stress, however, that I am not taking new powers; in the case of police authorities, these powers have existed since 1994, and since 2002 in the case of police forces. The Bill simply ensures that the existing intervention powers are fit for purpose. The changes made by the Bill draw on our experience over the past three years in embedding a performance culture and helping underperforming forces to turn around their performance. The Bill widens the sources of information that the Home Secretary can consider in deciding whether to exercise his powers, and ensures that that mechanism can be operated effectively.

Also relevant to the whole of the justice system is the creation of the new justice, community safety and custody inspectorate, which is provided for in part 4 of the Bill. This new single inspectorate for the justice sector will replace the five existing inspectorates covering the police, probation, prisons, court administration and the Crown Prosecution Service. The inspectorate will create a modern, unified, strongly led and forward-looking inspection regime. It will support front-line staff by minimising unnecessary duplication of inspection and the additional work that that entails. Perhaps most importantly, by taking a holistic view of the justice system, the new inspectorate will provide an enhanced capacity to challenge whether the police, courts, CPS and National Offender Management Service are giving the public the best possible service.

The Bill also provides the police with new powers to help forces to improve their provision of protective services, which was the driver behind the recommendations of Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. We will enable the police to request passenger and crew information about journeys within the UK, to mirror provisions that we have made in respect of international journeys in the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Bill that is being considered in the other place. This power will greatly enhance the ability of the police to investigate serious organised crime and even terrorism.

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South) (Lab): I appreciate that the proposal probably looks quite logical on paper, but does my right hon. Friend think it wise to abolish Her Majesty's inspectorate of prisons? Under its existing management, it is extremely well regarded. At a time when our prisons are fuller than they have ever been and when there is a need for constant external pressure to ensure that we obtain value for money, is it wise to dilute those powers and subsume this effective organisation into one that is larger and blander?

Mr. Clarke: First, there is no question of diluting the powers. That would be a mistake, and I agree with the implication of my hon. Friend's suggestion in that regard. Secondly, I certainly do not believe that the new inspectorate will be blander than the existing one. The interrelationship between prisons, probation, prosecution, police and others is an important one. I know that, from my hon. Friend's experience as Chair of the Home Affairs Committee, among other things, he understands how the discontinuities in the Home Office agencies have often given rise to problems. One purpose of the unified inspection regime is to deal with that.

My hon. Friend's point is serious and it reflects concerns raised by Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons. I pay particular tribute to Anne Owers and her team for the work they have done in making clear and creative statements about how detention takes place, and indeed to her predecessors, but I believe that the joint inspectorate will be capable of dealing effectively with precisely those concerns. I give the commitment, as I have to others, that if this matter wants to be debated further in Committee, it can be. I do not think that the fears my hon. Friend expresses are well founded, although I respect his experience in relation to what he says.

David Howarth (Cambridge) (LD): With regard to the new powers to give directions to police forces and authorities, does the Home Secretary accept that there is something new here, because the requirement for a negative inspection report is to be removed? Does he not accept that, without that necessary buffer between him and police forces and authorities, he is, in effect, taking responsibility for the whole of policing in England and Wales—both its successes and its failures?

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we are widening the sources that might provoke an intervention. That is because, for the sake of argument, something such as the Bichard review of the tragedies at Soham and what happened thereafter is not a "negative inspection report", but a serious examination, which it would be quite appropriate for the Home Secretary of the day to take into account. That is why it is right to widen the basis of impulses that cause the Home Secretary of the day, at whatever time, to be able to look at what is happening. It is widening, as the hon. Gentleman says, but for good reason.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the advent of the Metropolitan Police Authority has done a great deal for relations between police and the public in London? While successive Home Secretaries and commissioners, as well as the advent of neighbourhood policing, have had a lot to do with that, establishing a police authority with a democratic basis has turned policing in London from something imposed from outside into a service that is not only of and for Londoners, but, increasingly, provided by Londoners.

Mr. Clarke: I agree very much with my hon. Friend. That is one aspect of the Government's record in relation to policing of which we can be most proud. This is not historic: the Metropolitan police will establish the neighbourhood policing teams in London up to more than a year ahead of the national target precisely because of the encouragement of the Metropolitan Police Authority, as well as the personal commitment of the commissioner and his senior leadership. That relationship of positive encouragement towards protective policing is an example of accountability of the kind that the Bill is intended to strengthen.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) is bound to cause some concern? The Home Secretary has praised the current chief inspector of prisons, but her predecessors, like her, trod on a number of sensitive toes and did excellent work over many years. There is a fear that the new post, despite what my right hon. Friend has just said, might dilute the excellent work being undertaken. I hope he will bear that point in mind.

Mr. Clarke: First, it has been drawn to my attention by my Front-Bench colleagues that I did not pay appropriate tribute to the Mayor of London for his contribution to the improvement in policing in London, so I shall fill that gap by dutifully so doing.

On the matter raised by my hon. Friend, the key point for me is the independence of the inspectorate, which must be spiky, particularly when considering the conditions of detention and the circumstances that can arise there. That is a fundamental issue, even compared with performance management more generally.

I know my hon. Friend heard me pay tribute to the current chief inspector of prisons, but I also paid tribute to her predecessors in the role, and I do so again now. I have met them and discussed some of those issues with them as well. It is critical that that integrity of inspection of prisons, and indeed places of detention generally, is maintained, and I believe that our arrangements will do that.

I know the concern that my hon. Friend is expressing—I understand it—and as I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), the former Chair of the Home Affairs Committee, it is an appropriate matter to take further in Committee as we take it forward centrally.

Perhaps I shall end comment on this point by saying that it would be a great shame not to acknowledge the very tight interrelationship, particularly on our agenda to reduce reoffending, between what goes on in prison, what goes on in probation and what goes on in the rest of the criminal justice system, including the courts.

We have missed the opportunity of trying to achieve coherence for decades, and may have missed it for ever. That includes important subjects such as information technology and data on various people. A single inspectorate may help us to achieve that coherence, but I take my hon. Friend's point about the independence and prickliness—if that is the right word—of an inspector.

It is important to consider the role of all the national organisations. We have already legislated to establish the Serious Organised Crime Agency, which from this April will take the lead in tackling national and international drug-smuggling and people-trafficking, but there is a complex web of national support agencies. We have the Police Information Technology Organisation, the National Centre for Policing Excellence, Centrex, the Police Standards Unit, the Association of Chief Police Officers, Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary and the Home Office—a range of forces providing an array of services from the development of good practice to procurement, training and operational support.

There is wide agreement, especially among the police, that the present configuration of overlapping support agencies is an obstacle to the promotion of improvement in the service, and that it needs to be simplified and clarified. That is what the Bill sets out to do. Following proposals from ACPO, it will establish the national policing improvement agency. The agency will drive improvement in policing. It will create a rationalised and more dynamic national landscape, and will give the police service capacity to deliver on the critical priorities set out in the national community safety plan, including the roll-out of neighbourhood policing.

The existing organisations Centrex and PITO will be abolished, and some of their functions will be transferred to the NPIA. A number of the Home Office's policy development and operational support activities will also be transferred to the new agency, along with some of ACPO's policy functions. Its work will not, however, focus on the provision of day-to-day services, important though that may be. It will focus on the longer term, by helping to embed a culture of self-improvement in terms of performance, and of identifying and responding to the opportunities and challenges that the service will face over five or 10 years.

We must recognise that in an increasingly interdependent world, work with international partners to tackle terrorism and serious organised crime will be increasingly important. We have therefore included a number of measures to strengthen policing at international level. Computer misuse—the continued threat posed by computer hacking and denial-of-service attacks—is one of the growing new threats that can be tackled only through extensive international co-operation. To that end, the Bill takes up a private Member's Bill tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, South (Mr. Harris) to amend the Computer Misuse Act 1990. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his initiative.

The Bill provides a suitable opportunity for review of the Extradition Act 2003. As many Members will recall, the Act carried a complete overhaul of extradition law, some of which dated back to the 19th century. It also implemented the European arrest warrant. Following such a major reform of complex law, minor lacunae and operating difficulties have emerged in the first year of operation. The amendments in the Bill are intended to clarify and correct, and are essentially technical.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): One aspect of part 5 has my entire support. As the Home Secretary knows, there has been close co-operation between some Conservative Members and some members of his team in dealing with sexual offences against children. In particular, there was co-operation during the passage of the Bill that became the Sexual Offices Act 2003. Subsequently, there has been discussion with at least one of the Home Secretary's Ministers and other members of his team on further measures that are necessary. One is contained in part 5, but there are also the issues of encryption and access to information on risk-assessed paedophiles. Would the Home Secretary be agreeable if the chief of the Metropolitan police paedophile unit, an academic known to his team, and I had further discussions with the appropriate Under-Secretary of State to see whether we can use this unique opportunity to deal with one or two outstanding issues?

Mr. Clarke: I am very agreeable to that proposal. I pay tribute to the way in which the hon. Gentleman and others have worked with the Government. As he says, in this international world a number of changes are needed to establish a legal framework in which international co-operation can deal with criminals who, increasingly, work internationally. We should be happy to co-operate.

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): Does the Home Secretary agree that amendments on extradition would offer a good opportunity to clear up the grotesque anomaly whereby citizens of the United Kingdom accused of crimes against British interests in the UK can be extradited to America on the say-so of the American authorities, without any corresponding right in this country to demand that Americans should come here, without producing due cause? Is not it time that that anomaly was cleared up?

Mr. Clarke: As is characteristic of the hon. Gentleman, his description of the state of affairs is wrong; it frequently is, I regret to say. However, the Bill offers opportunities to debate all those matters.

As a package, the Bill makes a vital contribution to policing and justice from the neighbourhood level all the way up to international level. I commend the Bill to the House.

4.10 pm

Nick Herbert (Arundel and South Downs) (Con): I apologise to the House for the absence of the shadow Home Secretary, who is detained in the north today.

This is a curious Bill. It contains a number of disparate measures, some of which are perfectly sensible. All of us will support the principle of new powers to tackle child pornography and increased sentences for computer hacking. Other provisions such as the extension of summary justice will need closer examination in Committee, but this Bill maintains an unfortunate trend of increasing Government direction of the police.

The Bill aims to prepare police authorities for the Government's proposed regional police forces. It does not itself propose police amalgamations. The Government are already proceeding with those using secondary legislation under the Police Act 1996, but the manner in which the Home Secretary is using the powers should make the House extremely cautious about conferring on him the Bill's proposed new powers to alter the role and shape of police authorities without proper parliamentary scrutiny.

When police force amalgamations were last considered in the 1960s, a royal commission was established and it took two years to report. Legislation was introduced a year later. It was recognised that the structure of police forces is a fundamental issue on which the public, forces themselves and their authorities need to be properly consulted.

The way in which the Government are proceeding could not be more different, but it is entirely in character. The Home Secretary's proposals to amalgamate forces were announced last September not to the House but in a letter to police authorities. He gave them just four months to respond. He attempted, in the words of the Labour chairman of the Association of Police Authorities, to "bully and bribe" authorities to agree to his proposals and to meet the deadline—a tactic that backfired spectacularly when not one authority submitted. The Government did all they could to avoid parliamentary debate on the proposals, only finally agreeing to a debate before Christmas on a motion for the Adjournment when we and a number of hon. Members protested to Mr. Speaker.

Last month, the Home Secretary again gave police authorities an ultimatum, this time to submit proposals for voluntary mergers within just three weeks. Again, almost all the authorities concerned refused. Cleveland said no, Cheshire said no, Merseyside said no, Dyfed-Powys said no, Gwent said no, North Wales said no, South Wales said no, Warwickshire said no, West Mercia said no, West Midlands said no. Even Staffordshire, whose chief constable is leading—

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Second Reading debate seems to be going considerably wider than the printed Bill that we have in front of us. Is the speech of the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) related to the thrust of the Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): The hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) is about three minutes into his speech. Second Reading debates are customarily fairly broad. I am listening carefully to what he says and I trust that it will not be long before he more directly relates his remarks to the content of the Bill. However, he is allowed to give some background to his concerns.

Mark Pritchard: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I thought that I would try to help.

[Mark Pritchard]

The fact is that the Bill deals with local neighbourhood policing, and many of us on the Conservative Benches are concerned that strategic police authorities will detract from local neighbourhood policing. Therefore, it is completely in order that my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert) is making the points that he is making.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am always grateful for help from hon. Members. All I ask as guardian of the Standing Orders is that speeches be related to the measure that is before the House.

Nick Herbert: Even Staffordshire, whose chief constable is leading the Home Secretary's amalgamation "hit squad", said no. Every regional opinion poll conducted on this issue has said no. Yet just one week later, the Home Secretary announced that he would proceed with compulsory amalgamations, regardless. The report of Her Majesty's inspector of constabulary, Denis O'Connor, on which the Government are relying, said:

"The constitutional implications . . . are significant."

Yet this crucial decision was announced by way of a written statement, slipped into the Library of the House at 2.24 pm last Friday, just before the House rose.

Now, we are being asked to agree that similar order-making powers be given to the Home Secretary through this Bill, to allow him to alter police authorities' structure and functions. It is hardly surprising that the Association of Police Authorities has expressed alarm at the provisions. Its chairman, Bob Jones, said:

"The Home Secretary is now proposing to give himself power to change the role and membership of local authorities . . . and the bodies which represent them. Only Parliament, not the Home Secretary, should be able to do this".

The Home Secretary claims that he has rejected the idea of a national police force, but the Government's reorganisations are moving us steadily toward this model. Twelve police chiefs, rather than 43, will effectively answer to the Home Secretary, not their local communities. As Professor Tom Williamson observed in Jane's Police Review,

"Legislation has concentrated power in the Home Secretary, who sets the National Policing Plan and specifies outcomes. In this new public management paradigm, chief constables have an executive function only which is to deliver the plan . . . Following force amalgamations, a few chief constables, reporting to a senior Home Office official in regional Government offices, will be even more centrally influenced and controlled."

The new national policing improvement agency, introduced by clause 1, will not answer to police forces or to authorities; indeed, the Government have flatly rejected a proposal from police authorities that they should even part-fund the agency. The paymaster will call the tune and the paymaster is the Home Secretary. According to the Home Office, the agency will "assist police forces to deliver . . . national . . . priorities"

and

"support national implementation of the Home Secretary's key priorities for the police, as set out in the annual National Community Safety Plan".

In other words, the agency will effectively be the Home Secretary's enforcement arm, used to get the policing that he wants. There is already a police standards unit in the Home Office—a development that the 2004 White Paper admitted "represents a departure in terms of how the centre does business with the police service".

How will the national policing improvement agency work with the police standards unit? How will both work with the new inspectorate for justice, community safety and custody?

Police forces are besieged with agencies seeking to direct them. Such central direction has hardly been a success story in public services. The Government have introduced the Education and Inspections Bill to give schools more autonomy, and they introduced foundation hospitals for the same reason; yet, ironically, less autonomy for chief constables and instead, ever-closer direction by Ministers and their officials, is now the backbone of their approach to policing. Only a fig leaf of local accountability is to be maintained.

The Government claim that proposals in the Bill to align basic command unit and crime and disorder reduction partnership boundaries will strengthen local accountability, but the number of BCUs has reduced from around 400 when the Government came to power to 225 today. The Government are pressing CDRPs, which are currently based on district council areas, to merge. A Home Office report, slipped out in January, gave the game away. It stated that the Home Office

"will be working closely with ODPM as well as with regional and local partners to ensure that we do not end up with merged CDRP boundaries which are out of step with the likely future structure of local government."

What "likely future structure" of councils is this, exactly? Has Parliament been informed? Of course it has not. So far the Government's plans have been announced, in the usual manner, by leaks to the press.

The Government cannot credibly claim that police accountability will be achieved through local government scrutiny when the partnerships are being altered to make them more remote from the people. In West Sussex, for instance, the aim is to reduce the number of crime and disorder reduction partnerships from seven to just one. The real decisions will be taken not in the partnerships but in Whitehall and by chief officers in regional headquarters hundreds of miles from local communities. Inevitably, they will be less answerable to local people.

The Government's proposals for local police accountability are a mess. What happened to the Home Secretary's suggestion, repeated as recently as January, for local "policing boards . . . to hold the BCU commander to account"?

If the much-vaunted "community call to action" in clause 15 gives residents a direct means of drawing issues to the attention of the police, where does that leave police authorities? What happens if the police simply ignore the community's view?

The Government do not appear to understand the difference between accountability and public relations. The Home Secretary enthusiastically tells us that the public will shortly have the email addresses or telephone numbers of their local police officers. Good. But what matters is that the public actually get the response they want. Bournemouth police recently informed local shopkeepers that they were unable and unwilling to respond to the shoplifting of goods to less than the value of £75. Having the email address of local police officers in Bournemouth will plainly be of little use to small shop owners there.

The Government claim that they remain faithful to the traditional tripartite arrangement under which the Home Secretary, police authorities and chief constables have balanced powers. The Home Office website claims that "this three-way system prevents political interference in policing and avoids giving any single organisation power over the entire police service."

The previous Home Secretary put an end to that. He insisted on firing a chief constable against the will of the local police authority. He even threatened to take direct control of policing in London if the then Metropolitan Police Commissioner failed to comply with his demands.

This Bill will confer significant new powers on the Home Secretary to interfere with police forces and authorities. Clause 2 will give him wide powers to prescribe the membership of police authorities, and new powers to intervene in police forces. It will scrap the statutory duty on police authorities to determine local policing objectives, replacing it with additional powers for the Home Secretary. It will put basic command units on a statutory footing—an apparently unnecessary provision, but one that the Association of Police Authorities believes may be the precursor to more direct Home Office control. The association has warned:

"These provisions represent a fundamental constitutional change, and a significant shift in the balance of power within the tripartite relationship".

It is time to restore the balance and introduce proper local accountability to policing. First, where there are major reorganisations of a local force, there should be formal mechanisms to consult the public, including referendums where appropriate—something that the Government are signally failing to do.

James Duddridge (Rochford and Southend, East) (Con): Does my hon. Friend agree that, after a local referendum, the Government should be compelled to abide by the result? Should that happen at 51 per cent., or should there be a higher threshold?

Nick Herbert: Of course the Government should take notice of local referendums, but they did not do that in relation to the referendum on the elected regional assembly for the north-east. In spite of the overwhelming no vote by local people, the Government have continued with their objective of regional government by stealth. The creation of regional police forces is partly a step in that direction.

Secondly, instead of police chiefs being made to answer to the Home Secretary, they should be made formally accountable to local communities, via mayors, elected police commissioners or sheriffs, or directly elected police authorities. Indeed, the Government proposed directly elected police authorities in 2003, describing them as "a 'pure' form of local democracy—creating a direct, transparent link between communities and the police board."

What happened to that proposal? The operational independence of the police should be defined and protected. Local politicians should under no circumstances be permitted to direct the arrest of an individual or the initiation of a prosecution. However, they should be empowered to set strategic objectives for the police and to ensure that the objectives are met. Regardless of whether police forces are accountable locally or nationally, independent and transparent inspection of their performance will still be important.

Mr. Charles Clarke: I shall not respond to the general inaccuracies, but does the hon. Gentleman mean that he intends to give responsibility for the police in London to the Mayor of London?

Nick Herbert: The Home Secretary may know that we are consulting on a range of options to achieve local accountability of the police. The situation in London is more difficult because the commissioner has national and local policing functions. His accountability is already very confused and the fact that he is accountable to a number of bodies is problematic. We shall consider carefully how that should be resolved, but we will not resile from the principle, which the Home Secretary and the Government have not accepted, that police forces should be locally accountable. There is a fundamental difference between us. Whereas there are many things about which we agree in relation to neighbourhood policing, his view is that it is acceptable for the police increasingly to be directed by the Government, which is the essence of the Bill. Our view is that police forces should be locally accountable.

Concern has been expressed by a number of interested parties that a combined justice, community safety and custody inspectorate, as set out in part 4, will lose the expertise and focus present in existing inspectorates. We will want closely to examine this issue in Committee. Against that concern, which we should take seriously, is the fact that the cost of public inspection doubled from £250 million in 1997 to more than £550 million in 2002–03. There may also be significant advantages in creating a broader and more powerful inspectorate that is not so close to a particular department and can maintain its independence from Government more easily. I suspect that I am not alone in fearing that Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary was too easily deployed by the Government to support their desire to merge police forces.

When the Bill was published, the Home Office's news release proclaimed that it would "instill a culture of respect in society",

There is not a single measure in the Bill that begins to live up to that grandiose claim. The more high blown the rhetoric in the Government's respect agenda, the more certain we can be of its vacuity. Page 20 of the respect action plan is entitled "Everyone is Part of Everyone Else". I feel sure that the whole House would be intrigued to know what that means and how it will assist the fight against crime.

Journalists are being briefed that the Bill is a "flagship measure", a crucial part of the Government's respect agenda. In fact, only a few of the proposals in the respect agenda have found their way into the Bill. Clauses 16 and 17 expand the use of parenting orders. Since only

[Nick Herbert]

31 such orders were made in the five years between June 2000 and 2005, reducing their use was not really an option. Yesterday, we read of an exciting new scheme under which Government "super nannies" are to descend, like Mary Poppins, on chaotic families. With the Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety as the Minister for respect and nanny-in-chief in charge, this scheme is, according to The Sunday Times, the latest phase of the Government's respect agenda. Cynics who suspect that this is another worthless gimmick to be dropped or forgotten in a few weeks' time are missing the point. The story made the front page of a newspaper, so it has done its job.

The respect agenda is entirely remedial. It embodies the Government's view that problems can be solved only by centrally directed executive action. The Prime Minister once spoke about tackling the causes of crime. Today his focus is on enhancing police powers. A number of the Bill's proposals rely on the extension of police summary power and summary justice.

Clause 12 allows conditional cautions to include punitive conditions. Schedule 4 will allow arresting officers to set bail conditions. However, those proposals raise a number of serious issues. First, under the new bail conditions, the police alone will be able to make significant restrictions on someone's liberty, such as by tagging and with curfews, before they have even decided that there is enough evidence to bring a criminal prosecution. The power to impose punitive conditions in cautions will effectively allow the police to act as investigator, prosecutor and judge.

The Magistrates Association has said that is "extremely concerned" that the courts are simply being shut out of the process, but that appears to be just the beginning of a fundamental shake-up of the criminal justice system. According to an obviously well-informed commentator,

> "Ministers are drawing up plans to bypass the courts in the handling of hundreds of thousands more low-level crimes. Defendants who plead guilty to most offences with non-custodial sentences would, under their proposals, be sentenced by prosecutors, in consultation with the police. According to one document circulating in Whitehall, about half of the two million cases heard by magistrates every year could be processed without the costly and time-consuming business of a trial."

The Prime Minister has persuaded himself that we have reached a watershed, where the "rules of the game"—by which he means the quaint idea that convictions require a trial first—need changing to deal with not just terrorism, but antisocial behaviour. The judiciary may take a different view.

The second concern is that the Prime Minister says that summary justice will be tough and hard, but it may, in fact, mean soft justice. The maximum penalty for a conditional caution will be £500—an attractive alternative to a stiffer fine or even a custodial sentence for offenders committing actual bodily harm, affray, criminal damage, possession of class A drugs or carrying knives. Summary justice will increasingly mean two-tier justice, with a "get out of jail with your credit card" option for those who can afford to pay the fine or the fixed penalty notice for antisocial behaviour.

The third concern is that we need to debate whether all police officers should be empowered to exercise summary justice. There might be a case for restricting certain powers, such as the setting of bail conditions, to more senior constables, who have the experience and judgment to exercise them with discretion. Alternatively, we should consider whether such powers should be exercised at least with the scrutiny of a more senior officer. Those important issues need to be debated more thoroughly and examined closely in Committee.

When the Bill was published, the Home Secretary said that it > "would help to free up police time to deal with more serious crime".

In fact, there is just one measure in the Bill that might free up police time—the provision in clause 10 to allow chief officers to accredit trading standards inspectors to issue penalty notices. If the Government were serious about freeing up police time, the Bill would tackle the bureaucracy that prevents police officers from doing their job. It would end the requirement on police officers to record every stop that they make, filling in a foot-long form that takes seven minutes to complete. It would address the fact that it takes three and a half hours for an officer to process an arrest and that only 17 per cent. of a police officer's time is spent on patrol. It would give chief constables greater discretion over the employment of support staff, thus releasing warranted officers for front-line duties. It would introduce a modern and flexible pay and employment regime. It would replace incessant top-down demands for reporting, which sap so much time and morale across our public services, with simplified performance measurement. It would free up the police to fight crime, rather than to file. But the Bill does none of those things.

The closest that the Bill gets to police modernisation is in clause 4, which would allow standardisation of the powers of community support officers. The balance of the exact powers involved will need discussion in Committee. We favour giving chief constables as much discretion as possible in that respect, as in many others, but those provisions are being introduced before we have had a proper debate about the effectiveness of CSOs. I strongly support their deployment, but the Home Office's own evaluation, published earlier this year, found > "no evidence that CSOs were having a measurable impact on the level of . . . crime or . . . antisocial behaviour".

The Government's boast that they will recruit 25,000 CSOs by 2008 must be matched by both the funding to ensure that CSOs remain employed, because funding for them is tapered, and a more rigorous assessment of how to deploy them effectively.

The fight against terrorism will remain at the top of the police agenda, so we welcome the power in clause 8 to extend police search powers in airports. For the same reason, we will be open-minded about the power in clause 9 to gather bulk passenger information for ship and aircraft journeys in the UK. We will want to be persuaded that that is necessary and that it will contain adequate safeguards.

The Bill's technical amendments to the Extradition Act 2003 appear to be acceptable, although we will subject them to detailed scrutiny. We will seek to raise the issue of the UK-US extradition treaty that my hon.

Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) raised in an intervention on the Home Secretary. It has not been ratified by Congress and its one-sided operation is a serious cause for concern. The treaty was sold as being necessary to deal with terrorism and serious crime, but is being used to require the extradition of offenders who have a minimal connection with the US. We will propose amendments to restrict extradition to the US under the Extradition Act to terrorism cases until such time as full reciprocity is granted by the US, and will place safeguards to ensure that, in future, extradition will not happen if the alleged crime could be tried here, under domestic jurisdictions, and there is no clear causal link with the US.

In his Dimbleby lecture last year, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner called for a national debate on policing, and said:

"It is time to decide what kind of police service we want."

This is the right time to have such a debate. Important issues are at stake: the independence of police forces; how they should be accountable; and how they should be organised both to accommodate the demand for neighbourhood policing and to meet the renewed threat of domestic terrorism. The Bill is not much of an answer to those questions. It reflects the Government's preoccupation with the incessant reorganisation of, and intervention in, public services, but it shies away from the tougher, but essential, work force modernisation agenda that would truly enhance police performance. It places new summary powers in the hands of the police, but it also weakens their local accountability—an uncomfortable mix, particularly when public trust in the service has reached a record low.

There are measures in the Bill that are of value, so we will not seek to divide the House. However, we will seek to improve the Bill to check the powers of the Home Secretary and to enhance the local accountability of police forces. We will want to scrutinise carefully the new summary powers to be granted to officers. We all want to see police forces that provide value for money, instil public confidence and are effective in the fight against crime. We will work constructively to achieve those aims.

Mr. John Denham (Southampton, Itchen) (Lab): I welcome much of the Bill. I just want to make a few remarks that I hope are helpful about some of the issues that are raised by different elements of the Bill and some of the fundamental questions that lie behind it.

There is a fundamental dilemma for any Government who try to introduce legislation that is designed to improve police performance. That dilemma stems from the nature of the police service itself. Police officers exercise unique powers, so they need to have a unique constitutional position. We cannot consider police officers simply as we consider employees of other public services. That is equally true of the courts. To maintain public credibility, the people who take decisions in our courts also have to have their unique position recognised by Governments and legislation. That is where the dilemma comes in for Governments who try to improve police performance. If police officers, or judges and magistrates, are simply left to themselves, and their autonomy so completely respected that no one tries to set the framework in which they work, past experience is that the result is like that in other public services, namely, that services become slow and not sufficiently efficient or self-critical when it comes to performance.

The challenge for the Government is to create legislation that puts sufficient of the right drivers for improved performance into the police service—and, indeed, the Courts Service—without overstepping the mark and beginning to take the decisions that it is fundamental to ensure taken by professional members of the service itself.

Over the past few years, the Government have done a good job on improving police performance. When the Home Affairs Committee took evidence on police reform last year, we were told by all sides that the performance culture of the police service had been transformed at every level. Police authorities, police forces, basic command units and neighbourhood teams were much more focused on how well they were tackling crime and the fear of crime than they were five years previously, which is one of the most significant achievements to date of the Government's reform process.

David Taylor: My right hon. Friend mentions neighbourhood teams. Does he agree that one way of cementing and developing neighbourhood accountability would be to establish a more formal relationship between basic command units—or, perhaps, neighbourhood units—and neighbourhood watch associations? I went to the launch of the county neighbourhood watch association in Leicestershire and Rutland last Thursday and was immensely impressed by the work that is done. Leicestershire constabulary is good at the process, but there is no obligation on police authorities to have such relationships. Would those relationships not represent a way ahead?

Mr. Denham: Such relationships are valuable, but for reasons that I shall set out I am not sure about the extent to which central Government should specify what is appropriate for each area. We must get such judgments right.

There has been a significant change to the performance culture of the police over the past few years. The creation of the police standards unit, the publication of better performance data, the fact that most crime information is available to front-line police officers in real time and the greater public awareness of police performance have contributed to that. However, there is uncertainty about the way in which we want to drive performance in the next phase of police reform. The Bill contains several valuable measures that will work in the right direction and other aspects that might not be wrong, but need to be treated with caution so that when trying to get the best possible performance the Government do not overstep the mark of their powers.

I want comment on five aspects of the Bill. On intervention powers, the Bill revisits territory that was well discussed when we considered the Police Reform Act 2002. The Government are trying, as I did initially in those days, to broaden the Home Secretary's powers of intervention on forces. I am inclined to think that hard cases make bad law. The Home Secretary referred to the Soham case and the Humberside police service in his speech and talked about the desire to be able to act in response to information that does not come from the inspectorate itself. However, as the hon. Member for Cambridge (David Howarth) said in an intervention, if the Home Secretary takes powers to intervene in a wide range of circumstances without any independent inspection of the police service, he takes for himself responsibility for the performance of not only every police force, but every part of every police force. The Government need to be careful about getting into such circumstances.

I understand that when the Soham investigation was going on, there was frustration that legislation that the House had passed in the previous few years did not seem sufficiently adequate to give the Home Secretary clear powers to intervene. However, that is not quite the same as saying that whenever something happens, the question from the media and public to the Home Secretary of the day should be, "Why don't you intervene now? You've got wide-ranging powers, so why don't you do something about it?" There is a danger that Ministers will be under intense pressure to intervene when they and anyone who is close to the police service know that it would be better for politicians to stay one removed. I hope that the Committee will consider carefully whether the Bill puts the dividing line in exactly the right place.

There is a powerful case for having a unified inspectorate that runs right across the criminal justice system. Many of the flaws in the system arise because of discontinuities, gaps and poor liaison among the courts, the probation service, prisons, the police and so on. I hope that in Committee careful consideration will be given to how the inspectorate will maintain a harsh light on the performance of individual parts of the system, and not only on the joins between the system.

In dealing with the police service, it is not uncommon to hear police officers say, "The problem is not really us; it is the way that we relate to the courts, or the way that we relate to the probation service or the prisons." There is often much truth in that. Sometimes, it is the case that the police and their performance are at fault. At present, Ministers have at hand a considerable degree of high-level professional expertise in Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. I think that in future Ministers will want to be sure that they have an equally high level of professional expertise at their disposal in examining the police service itself as well as being involved in the entire operation of the criminal justice system.

I endorse earlier interventions about the Prison Service. There is a particular responsibility on the independent inspectorate to be able to visit prisons. That is to turn up unannounced to examine the conditions in which we are holding people in custody and to have a focus on how the system operates as a whole. It must not divert from that essential role. I hope that the way in which that role will be delivered will be considered carefully in Committee.

I shall refer briefly to the proposed national police improvement agency. It is something that makes a great deal of sense in that there are disparate organisations and a great deal of police force time is wasted in dealing with them. However, there is a difference between embedding professional expertise at every level of the police service and ensuring that the police service nationally can respond to current priorities. There is a role nationally for the police service to work together, as it has done over the past year on alcohol, or as it did a few years ago on dealing with street crime. Certain issues arise where getting everyone to work together makes a great deal of sense.

Also important is having the latest and best investigative skills when dealing with murder, tackling fraud or investigating internet crime. Those skills must be learned and promulgated throughout the police service efficiently and effectively. One of the problems is that best practice is often developed in an isolated way and is not spread as quickly as it should be throughout the service. Accordingly, one of the aims of the National Centre for Policing Excellence was to be able to develop a high level of policing skills and to spread them quickly.

In moving towards a national police improvement agency, it is important that those areas of professional improvement and expertise continue to be developed and that they are not lost by an organisation that is more focused either on volume crime or on the immediate policing priority of the day, whether that be gun crime, knife crime, burglary or whatever. I hope that consideration will be given in Committee to how the agency will be able to balance those different pressures so that we arrive at the highest possible quality of policing.

As for the accountability of the police, I think that the Government have got it right in placing an emphasis on future police authorities and on those unitary council members who have responsibility for community safety measures, and also for exercising the ability to trigger community action through the local authority scrutiny committees.

A few years ago, I was quite depressed when I thought that we would have a plethora of different structures, all floating around the area that we are discussing. In most instances of antisocial behaviour it is not only a policing matter. These instances will involve youth service intervention and environmental services, for example. To focus the ability to get a response through the local authority scrutiny structures seems to me to be the right approach. I say to the hon. Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert), who leads for the Opposition, that I think that his party is going down the wrong track—this is a non-partisan point—in looking for separate elected bodies. There is a debate about how much local accountability to elected people we want in the police service. However, a proliferation of elected bodies rather than concentrating on local councils seems to be the wrong way to go. As I have said, I think that the Government have got it right.

I conclude on the question of additional police powers, particularly conditional cautioning and the extension of the ability to impose parenting orders to a wide range of bodies, including social housing providers. What are broadly described as summary justice measures, particularly fixed penalty notices for drunken behaviour and so on, have achieved a great deal of success. The more that we use complicated and sophisticated sentencing and orders, the more cautious we must be to ensure that the people involved have the necessary expertise to operate effectively. If we start to tell front-line police officers that they will have responsibility for designing a sentence that includes rehabilitation, punishment and restorative justice in an effort to reduce reoffending in one go, the more pressure we will put on individuals who are not trained or expected to know how to do that job. The more that we expect people without the necessary expertise in family issues to make parenting orders the more we should ask how they will obtain that expertise.

I am not against conditional cautioning or the extension of the use of parenting orders, but careful scrutiny of the way in which those powers will be exercised is required. I hope that in their consideration of conditional cautioning, Committee members will look at whether there should be a clear difference of responsibility between the arresting or investigating officer and the person who puts the condition on the order. It should not be too difficult to conceive of ways in which proper sentencing expertise is brought to bear on the conditional caution without the arresting officer necessarily being responsible for doing so. That would achieve the gain of not embarking on a substantial court procedure for a low-level minor crime, while creating confidence that there would be consistency of sentencing across the country for similar types of offence and ensuring that the sentences that are passed—that is effectively what the measures are—are appropriate to the offender and to the offence.

4.52 pm

Lynne Featherstone (Hornsey and Wood Green) (LD): This is rather a sneaky Bill and, potentially, a pernicious one. If not substantially amended in Committee, it will reduce the freedom of the individual, increase the power of the state, remove the autonomy and capability of bodies on whom we rely to hold the police to account, allow direct Government intervention in police business without any objective basis on which to do so, increase the surveillance society, extend summary justice, possibly damage community relations and run the risk of increasing human rights abuses in prisons. Even the seemingly welcome development of involving the local community in policing has the potential to create dangers and difficulties, so there is much to be done in Committee.

To begin on a more amenable note, however, we support a number of the Bill's provisions. The incorporation of the Central Police Training and Development Authority and the Police Information Technology Organisation into a national policing improvement agency is a logical and sensible step forward. It almost goes without saying that we support the Government in their attempt to tackle better the problems caused by computer hacking. Given their penchant for creating surveillance databases, whether on national identity or on DNA, the security of those databases is paramount. Whatever the dangers they pose to civil liberties, they must be secure. Of course we support the Bill's proposal to tackle the illegal possession of indecent photographs of children and, indeed, the harmonisation and the extension of powers for community support officers.

The proposal that the Independent Police Complaints Commission should take on the role of ensuring that complaints and misconduct in the immigration and asylum system are properly investigated is another welcome measure. Only last week, I visited the IPCC, which will now investigate complaints against immigration and nationality personnel and exercise specified enforcement functions. That new area of expertise is a perfect translation of its function to investigate police complaints. Such work is extremely sensitive and the proposal will not only create a better system but, equally vitally, it will improve public opinion of the system.

Before I move on to the meat of Liberal Democrat concerns about the Bill, I shall touch on the section on extradition. I shall not go into detail as most of the proposals are technical. However, it is not lost on us that the Government's track record on matters connected with extradition is hardly exemplary, given that they have so singularly and spectacularly failed to deal with the unfair, unequal and embarrassing nature of our extradition arrangements with the United States. We give the US what they want—all they have to do is demonstrate to us that the person in question is the person they want—whereas when we want someone, we have show evidence against that person.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): This is an extraordinarily important point, and one that we argued vigorously at the time of the introduction of the provisions. Does my hon. Friend share my astonishment at the Prime Minister's response last week, when questioned on this subject? He suggested that the only purpose of the unequal and unfair extradition arrangements with the United States was to deal with terrorism, but we know perfectly well that they are being used to deal with fraud offences, which are in no way related to terrorism. Does she not find that offensive?

Lynne Featherstone: Indeed; my hon. Friend is right. The previous Home Secretary signed the treaty in Washington. We put it into force by statute, but the US did sweet nothing so there is no law to be executed on their side. We undertake our unfair and unequal treatment voluntarily. That sums up our current relationship with America—we jump, even when we do not have to.

I shall cover some of our primary concerns about the proposals in the Bill. We have serious misgivings about the Government once again seeming to believe that crime can be tackled directly from the Home Office and giving powers to the Home Secretary to dictate the form and function of police authorities. The Government clearly want to match their new super-size police forces with police authorities newly reduced in size, but the proposals will reduce local accountability and take away independence and autonomy. The Bill allows for a reduction in numbers on authorities, theoretically down to one member. Tempting though that might seem to the Home Secretary, I do not believe that it is the purpose of the proposal.

Under the present system, the appointment of local authority members to such a body should reflect the political balance on the appointing authority or authorities, so the idea that each principal authority should have one seat on the new police authority and that that person should be the lead member on community safety will inevitably mean that the composition will reflect the majority party on the local authority. Applied around the country, that will not lead to political balance of any sort. Political proportionality, which has long been a tradition on those authorities, will disappear unless it occurs accidentally.

The other aspect of authority membership that concerns me is the removal of the magistrate members. They are a specified component of such an authority, and they will still be able to apply as independents. However, in the five years that I served on the Metropolitan Police Authority, I observed that the knowledge and experience that the magistrate members brought from the criminal justice system was invaluable in holding the police force to account. At a time when we are aiming for joined-up working and joined-up technology so that cases can be chased through from the police to the criminal justice system, the proposal seems a serious and unnecessary change for the worse. There will have to be an extraordinary justification or rationale for dispensing with such a valuable component of what is meant to be an independent authority holding the police to account for local people. Perhaps that is the problem—the magistrates are a bit too clever and might frustrate the Home Secretary's direct intervention in future.

The Home Secretary will be able to decide which issues a police authority looks into. That involves constraining the function of police authorities, which he will be able to control literally at will. If he believes that all or part of a police force is failing or may fail, he may direct the chief officer and/or the police authority to undertake specific measures to remedy or prevent such a failure, which will take place on his own cognisance. As has been said, in broadening the trigger that decides when he can direct police authorities, there is a risk that the power will be overused and misused. I would therefore welcome further explanation from the Minister on objectives, plans and reports for police authorities and on the Home Secretary's new role in relation to issuing such directives.

Once again, it seems that the Government are trying to diminish local accountability by allowing Whitehall to dictate, intervene and direct. The shift of control to the Home Secretary without the need for a negative report automatically means that there will be less accountability. Although the Minister may say that such interventional powers will be used only as a last resort, we do not have a definition of what the Home Secretary means by "failing" and "last resort". The power is a carte blanche for interference, and we need the Minister to clarify the terms "failing" and "last resort".

At first sight, the mini-safeguard on public engagement appears to be an innovative and welcome step, because it gives the local authority scrutiny committee a role in examining how persons and bodies responsible for tackling crime and disorder carry out their functions. As a Liberal Democrat, localism and community involvement play into our fundamental philosophy of power to the people, but we must build in safeguards both for the community and for the police. A scrutiny committee sounds great in theory because local people know what is best for the local area, but there are concerns about whether the provision could be misused.

Mr. Francois: The hon. Lady has discussed the Liberal Democrat commitment to localism and local people. Will she explain how it squares with the Liberal Democrats' traditional support for regional government, given that when that concept was put to the vote in the north-east it was destroyed by a margin of 78 per cent. to 22 per cent.?

Lynne Featherstone: I am happy to explain our policy outside this debate, which is about the Government's proposals.

Mr. Francois: Is that it?

Lynne Featherstone: Yes, that is it.

Could the proposal allow one persistent, complaining constituent to divert resources on unreasonable complaints? I am a local councillor—I am sure that other Members are or have been local councillors—and it is not unknown for those who should the loudest for our attention to hijack resources, time and issues on a repeated and regular basis. Those who need police action and who cannot get a police response will not necessarily trigger that function or use that power.

On the extension of powers on antisocial behaviour, youth offending teams will be able to issue parenting orders if they believe not only that a child is engaging in antisocial behaviour, but that a child may engage in such behaviour, which continues a worrying trend of legislation involving the prediction of bad behaviour. Although the Government's intention is obviously to help all parents to ensure that their children do not engage in bad behaviour in the future, and to help those parents who are not currently coping—which is a measure that I heartily support—the proposal may stigmatise children who have done no wrong.

When I intervened on the Home Secretary, I mentioned that youth offending teams have some experience on which to base such a judgment about a child or parent, but the Bill extends the right to make parenting contracts and apply for parenting orders to registered social landlords. Those issues are difficult for communities and my concern is that the decision should be made by those with the right expertise, which I am not convinced that the RSLs have got.

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): I am listening to the hon. Lady with great interest. How would she take this matter forward in terms of getting more people involved?

Lynne Featherstone: I will return to that point on another occasion. I am here to argue against the proposals in the Bill.

The role of RSLs has always concerned housing issues. Although they may well have a role in referring cases that they regard as worrying to an expert, they are not, as far as I am aware, qualified to issue such judgments, which may stigmatise a family or a child, albeit that their intentions were honourable. Will the Minister elaborate on how that might be regulated, or how qualifications or training might be involved, to ensure that anyone given that power to invoke the order has the necessary expertise, objectivity and accountability?

What starts as a parenting order becomes, if breached, a criminal offence. That is worrying. It follows the trend of converting an offence to a criminal offence, presumably with a custodial sentence. The problem with that part of being tough on crime is that, when push comes to shove, the custodial sentence has often seemed out of proportion to the crime. Despite guidelines to magistrates and courts stating that such breaches are not to be regarded as not serious, those carrying out the sentencing appear to disagree. That is particularly evident in relation to antisocial behaviour orders. A third of ASBOs are being breached and sentencing is not following guidelines. The Minister may be aware that I have tabled a parliamentary question to try to establish exactly what is happening with the sentencing that follows breached ASBOs.

The proposed extension of police powers—the general power to impose conditions on pre-charge bail for all criminal investigations and the power to impose punitive conditions on cautions—amounts to summary justice. Because those powers are applicable to all criminal investigations, there must be a danger that they will be abused. The Bill enables restrictions, fines or summary sentencing to be imposed on an individual. Those powers mean that the police could, at will, decide to act as they have done before where they have been given such discretion. There will be, in their summary justice, a tendency towards disproportionality. The race equality impact assessment says that we do not yet have enough information to judge the impact of this, and that that should be monitored. I hope that we can discuss that in Committee. Several elements of the Bill lay open community issues.

Part 4, which aims to merge the five criminal justice inspectorates, has been widely discussed. We have no objection to that in principle, but we are worried about the loss of a specialist quality service within the new joint inspectorate. The proposal has provoked apprehension, particularly among the prison and police sectors. We are greatly concerned about the practicalities of such a merger and what reduction in standards, or loss, might come about as a consequence. I ask the Government to think twice about the details of this, particularly in relation to prisons. The inspection of prisons and the discovery of abuses is a truly specialised skill. The prison inspectorate plays a unique role in upholding human rights, and I am worried about losing such an important protection for those who are held in our prisons.

The current system for detecting abuses and faults has been developed independently by the prison inspectorate from its vast and specialist knowledge. If it were to be incorporated into one general body, I fear not only that its specialised knowledge would be in danger of diminishing, but that there would be less room for it to be truly independent, with the discovery of abuses being jeopardised as a result. Can the Government give a reassurance that the proposed merger will not result in what amounts merely to an audit trail and bean-counting function?

Credibility is also important. Her Majesty's chief inspector of constabulary has a phenomenal reputation. When he produces a report or makes a statement, the public, but, more important, the police, genuinely listen. A generalist or managing chief inspector will never be able to command such respect, legitimacy or confidence.

I want to consider a further danger—in the balance between the freedom of individuals to go where they will without fear or favour if they do no harm, and the protection of our citizens against crime and terrorism. There is a problem with the proposal about making passenger flight lists available because it moves from the ability to request information on domestic flight passenger lists in the cause of detecting a crime, to the surveillance of an individual's movements before a crime has been committed. The Government's intention to gather passenger data from domestic journeys means another fundamental shift in the relationship between state and individual. Although the Bill provides for the same powers as those in the Immigration, Nationality and Asylum Act 2006 on international flights, there is a difference when such surveillance is internal.

It is imperative in the sort of socio-political climate in which we live to avoid a culture of total suspicion of anyone and everyone. We must therefore have the courage to defend civil liberties as the process goes forward. Although I am sure that the motivation behind the proposal is to enable police to see patterns of travel to stop crime and, presumably, to recognise those who might appear suspicious, it marks a shift to crime prediction under the label of crime prevention. It is a difficult line to walk but, with no ground for suspicion and no crime to investigate, there is a worry that there may be nothing to stop the police selecting all routes at all times. There would therefore be nothing to protect individuals from inappropriate surveillance of their movements or to defend their liberty to move around the country. There must therefore be concern about the open-ended permit to watch what we do and safeguards must be put in place to protect individuals against inappropriate surveillance or use of the information about their movements. I hope that, in Committee, we can agree on safeguards.

In a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael), the Home Office stated that clause 9 was > "not designed to allow the routine surveillance of all domestic passengers. The police will only request data on the domestic routes that are of operational interest and likely to provide the greatest amount of intelligence essential to combat terrorism and serious organised crime. They are not designed to keep track of all domestic passengers.

> They will help the police gain effective intelligence on the movement of known terrorist suspects and criminals and will allow them to build up a detailed picture of suspect passengers, travel patterns and networks."

Although the letter suggests that there is no intention of blanket use of the power, the police officer who attended the meeting to discuss the Bill believed that the purpose was to build up patterns to prevent crime or terrorism. Surely that must be the point of introducing such a power. How far is the step from the contents of the Home Office letter—using the power only when tracking a "person of interest"—to an illegitimate interest in persons, especially those with Muslim-sounding surnames? That is another concern in the context of the race equality impact assessment. Will the power be extended to all flights at all times? The race equality impact study has not found a problem so far.

[Lynne Featherstone]

However, we should examine that in Committee because it is an obvious danger, which is inherent in tracking or predicting movement patterns.

Section 44 of the Terrorism Act 2000 allows stops without a reasonable ground for suspicion. That was theoretically for a specified area and time but has ended up, for example, for the whole of London all the time. Has the Minister considered establishing an independent body to oversee collecting information on domestic flights? What assurance can be given that information will not be collected on all flights all the time?

In the letter, we are told that "requests for information will be recorded and there will be a clear audit trail to safeguard against 'fishing trips'. And that in addition, only police officers of the rank of superintendent or above may authorise a request."

However, as I said, section 44 started with similar safeguards, but its operation is now permanent across London.

There is a great range of issues about which we have concerns and I hope that we can work with the Government on them in Committee. I will listen with great interest to the debate and to the Minister's responses to the issues that I have raised.

5.15 pm

Mrs. Madeleine Moon (Bridgend) (Lab): It would appear that there is much in this Bill that parties on both sides of the House clearly welcome. I welcome the provision for a national policing improvement agency. It will pull together a number of bodies and reduce the opportunities for conflicting advice and guidance.

Bringing the basic crime units together in line with local authorities will, I am sure, assist those who have not had the benefit of coterminous boundaries such as we have had in Bridgend. F division in Bridgend covers the county borough of Bridgend and the parliamentary constituencies of myself and my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies). That makes sense. It helps joint working, it brings joined-up government, and it should help with communications and partnership working. It also helps with our community safety partnership, which in Bridgend has been incredibly effective and supportive of all the agencies involved, and has pulled together joint working, joint networking and co-ordination of all the services that have helped to reduce crime in my constituency. Indeed, crime across Wales has fallen 5 per cent. over the last year, and the police force in my constituency has been one of the best performing in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stewart Jackson (Peterborough) (Con): Is the hon. Lady not a little concerned by the fact that recent experience has shown that coterminous boundaries between basic command units and local authorities sometimes provide an excuse to reduce head counts in the amalgamation?

Mrs. Moon: I cannot comment on head counting, but I can comment on the effect on efficiency. I am more concerned about the efficiency and effectiveness of policing than head counting. I know that the policing in Bridgend has been efficient, effective and successful, and that is what I am looking for. I would have thought that the hon. Gentleman, too, would look for that. It is something to be welcomed.

When I met members of my community safety partnership, they said that they felt that every antisocial behaviour order granted by the courts was a failure for them. However, they have been successful because they have used the antisocial behaviour legislation and the community safety partnership as a way of working together to ensure that troubled youngsters at risk of coming into the criminal justice system are targeted for resources and for the services that can help them to stay within legal boundaries and improve their behaviour. If the services are targeted at them, they will have access to the support, advice, guidance and mentoring that they need.

I welcome the extension of the remit of the Independent Police Complaints Commission to the immigration service. That will increase trust and provide a rigorous assessment of complaints about the immigration service.

I also welcome the standardisation of powers for community support officers and the extension of their powers to cover truancy. That is an obvious and clearly needed extension—a sensible measure that will assist local authority education welfare officers to ensure that as many pupils as possible are in school in school hours, which will reduce the risk of young people being drawn into petty crime, drugs and alcohol abuse.

The deployment of community support officers in my constituency has been highly effective. Opposition Members who suggest that they have been a failure should come to Bridgend to see how our police force has learned to utilise them effectively. In one of my wards, Wild Mill, community support officers have reduced the incidence of vandalism, antisocial behaviour, and drug and alcohol abuse. Generally, it is now a much safer community in which to live.

The one negative, if there is one, with community support officers in my constituency is that we tend to lose them, albeit to the professional police force. They see their job as a way of learning the basic skills and gaining the expertise and knowledge that will enable them to be more effective and move into a full-time career in the police. However, that is the only negative that I have found. We will welcome the increase in the number of community support officers in Bridgend.

I am sure that the Minister is waiting for the word "but"—and it is coming. There are proposals in the Bill about which I must say "but"; I would not be standing here unless there were. I therefore seek reassurance and some changes. I am worried about the extension of the right of housing departments and registered social landlords to call for parenting contracts and parenting orders. I do not believe that the staff in those agencies have the required skills and expertise, or the necessary background in assessment and evaluation, to make such decisions.

I shall cite an example from one of my surgeries. A gentleman who came to see me described the problems that he was experiencing with a neighbour in the block of flats that he lived in. The neighbour's behaviour was extremely difficult, and was in many respects a prime example of behaviour calling for a parenting contract.

The gentleman described the scratching of cars and the smearing of oil on car windows. He told me about the problems of noise and the deliberate playing of records late at night. He described how his neighbour would knock on his door when he was getting ready for bed late at night: he would hear banging on the door, but when he opened it the neighbour would be gone. All this would appear to be prime territory for a parenting order, but after I had heard more about the perpetrator's background, I realised that this involved a mental health problem, and a parenting order is not the best way of dealing with such problems.

Staff in agencies that call for parenting orders and parenting contracts need to assess fully the reasons behind the failures leading to the behaviour being experienced. Every alternative means of support and engagement should be employed before a parenting order or contract is called for. Those skills reside within the social services departments, the mental health services and the youth justice teams, and their engagement must be assured before anyone is given the power or the responsibility to call for an order or a contract.

Building parental competence is a complex process, which organisations such as Sure Start are best placed to provide. As for skills development, the youth justice teams and other organisations in my constituency, such as Youth Works and KPCY—the Kenfig Pyle community youth project—offer the mentoring, the boundary setting and the skills base that will allow parents and children to understand where their behaviour needs to change and improve.

I want to speak briefly about the proposal to create a single inspectorate. Before I entered the House, I worked as an inspector with the Care Standards Inspectorate for Wales. I welcome the creation of a single inspectorate; I recognise the value of such a body. I can see the sense in combining five inspectorates into one. There will be savings in information technology, financial administration and human resource functions—but I must add a "but". I seek assurances that the ethos, skills base, culture and expertise required for those who work in the individual inspectorates will not be diluted into some fantasy base whereby a skilled inspector in one field is automatically considered to have transferable skills.

Some skills are transferable, but inspectors need to remain at the forefront of best practice and of requiring and encouraging change and improvement. They must be ever watchful for abuses, failures and neglect. Full cognisance of legislation and service providers is required to meet the needs of a single inspectorate, and we must ensure that the focused skills of the five inspectorates are not diluted but strengthened by joint working.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) pointed out, unannounced inspections and the monitoring and reporting of the gaps between agencies are important, but the individual performance of each agency must still be the focus of the inspection.

I would urge an appropriate start-up period. Time for those five agencies to come together to talk about how they will integrate, co-ordinate and start to work together is critical to the success of the new agency. Not putting that start-up time in place would reduce public confidence in the competence of the new agency, and it must be part of any move to a single inspectorate.

I give a conditional welcome to the concept of the community call for action. This must be extended to a call not only to the police but to the local authorities, to provide the community facilities, services and agencies that can be critical in ensuring that there is no antisocial behaviour and no low-level crime in communities.

I cite, for example, the community of Kenfig Hill in my constituency, where the local authorities failed to provide funding for KPCY, which has reached the end of its lottery funding. KPCY provides support for 750 youngsters; it has cut antisocial behaviour, petty crime, vandalism and graffiti, and provides invaluable mentoring and support to young people, as well as to local parents.

One parent said to me that she could not have coped as a single parent if she had not had the support of KPCY, and had not known that it was somewhere safe to send her children where they could do their homework, get access to computers and play without being targeted by drug users and drug sellers, as well as those who would target youngsters to get into petty crime and petty thieving.

The local police strongly support the retention of KPCY, knowing that crime will increase exponentially in their area if the organisation goes. The community call for action must enable communities to call on local authorities such as Bridgend county borough council to provide funding for youth facilities such as KPCY and restore funding to youth groups such as the Guides, Scouts and Brownies—organisations not known for attracting youngsters with antisocial tendencies—but they do not even provide funding for youth facilities at that level.

Mark Pritchard: Does the hon. Lady agree that excellent work is done up and down this land not only by the Scouts, Cubs, Brownies and Guides, but by cadet forces such as the Air Training Corps, the Army Cadet Force and the Sea Cadets, yet the Government fail to put in the adequate funding that those organisations require, despite the fact that the young people involved are a credit to all our communities?

Mrs. Moon: I would endorse virtually everything the hon. Gentleman said, other than his remarks about Government funding. Surely the Government hand out rate support grant to the local authorities and the local authorities decide how it is spent. The Conservative party has always and consistently argued that decisions should be made nearer to the point of service delivery.

My local authority calls itself a rainbow alliance of Liberal Democrats and Conservatives, but it will not fund leisure services that are critical to ensuring that youngsters realise that we adults value them, want them to engage with society, and want them to enjoy services of a quality that will offer them an alternative to hanging around on street corners, sitting on old ladies' front walls, throwing petrol into the street and setting fire it, and throwing flour bombs and ink bombs. Such low-level bad behaviour makes communities despair. I am glad that the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) also wants my local authority to support funding for youth services in Bridgend.

[Mrs. Moon]

I do not want young people to become part of the criminal justice system because of a lack of youth and leisure facilities or adequate children's social services departments. My local authority has been criticised in that regard. As my community safety partnership says, we must recognise that virtually every antisocial behaviour order represents a failure on the part of the statutory services to provide the support network and skills needed to show youngsters an alternative way of behaving.

I am reaching the end of my "buts", but I have a final "but" in regard to conditional cautions. I feel that they have a key role in presenting offenders with an immediate response to their actions—an immediate recognition of what they have done and what they need to do to make reparation. However, I question whether the policeman on the beat has the necessary skills base on which to construct a rehabilitative conditional caution. Somewhere along the line, we need to incorporate responsibility for a senior police officer and liaison with social services, community safety partnerships and youth justice teams, to establish what conditional cautions should contain.

The Bill's aim is justice, not punishment. Justice requires that people have alternatives, that there is rehabilitation, and that there are opportunities for those who will come within the purview of the police. I hope that in Committee the minor changes for which Members have called today will be possible. It has been pleasing to observe the common desire to find a constructive and effective solution, and that is what a Committee stage should be for. Apart from my few "buts", I support the Bill.

5.32 pm

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): When the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) welcomed the fact that every speaker so far had generally welcomed the Bill, my heart sank somewhat. I did not interpret those speeches in quite the same way. However, the hon. Lady's long row of "buts" then emerged, and she presented us with a considered and thoughtful response to many of the Bill's provisions. That applies not least to her description of parenting orders, which bring into question the Government's top-down approach to the respect agenda. She was right to say that judgments about parenting or antisocial behaviour cannot be imposed by formula by an office in Whitehall, although I fear that that is one of the aims of the Bill.

In one respect, I concur with most of the speeches made so far—indeed, all except the Home Secretary's speech. The Bill appears to be a very centralising measure. The Home Secretary tut-tutted at my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert), suggesting that his facts were wrong, but we need only open the Bill to see that it gives the Secretary of State additional powers. How can a Bill that gives a Secretary of State additional powers be described as anything other than a centralising measure? Indeed, the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), who is not in his place at the moment, expressed concern on behalf of the Select Committee on Home Affairs at the idea that this is a centralising measure.

I draw the House's attention to one particular provision. Set out in schedule 2 is new section 40 of the Police Act 1996, which replaces with a very wide power the pretext for intervention in the 1996 Act, as amended by the Police Reform Act 2002. At the moment, any intervention by the Secretary of State in the running of a constabulary depends on a trigger from an inspectorate. There has to be a manifest failing in the performance of a constabulary before there can be an intervention. That is itself a stronger power than this Government inherited—and now it is to be replaced by the following, under the heading "Power to give directions in relation to police force":

> (1) Where the Secretary of State is satisfied that the whole or any part of a police force is failing to discharge any of its functions in an effective manner, whether generally or in particular respects, he may direct—
> (a) the chief officer of police of the force,
>
> (b) the police authority responsible for maintaining the force, or
> (c) both of them".

That is a far more general power to direct police forces than has ever existed in national legislation before. I therefore commend the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert), as well as many of the points made by the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone), about the centralising tendencies of the Bill. This is a further twist to the ratchet of centralisation of police forces. Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friends responsible for the policy of Her Majesty's official Opposition on the Bill will hold open the prospect of our voting against it on Third Reading, in protest at its centralising aspects.

It was utterly ridiculous for the Home Secretary to mutter that amalgamation and police force structures were irrelevant to the Bill. I am always wary of instructing the occupant of the Chair to rule things out of order—the hon. Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor) came a cropper, rightly, after raising a point of order. The amalgamation of constabularies is the most graphic feature of current Government centralisation policy.

The Government have yet to put up a serious concrete argument in favour of these force amalgamations. They have yet to justify the £500 million cost, the disruption to the operation of police forces, and the inevitable effect on police morale and performance as mergers take place. Inevitably, our police forces will become increasingly remote if their command structures are moved up to regional level, destroying historic local loyalties. The Government have yet to explain why bigger forces—which they call strategic forces—have any merit, except in the eyes of those sitting in offices in Whitehall, who will have fewer heads to order around, fewer units to manage and an easier job, at the expense of local policing. The Home Secretary continues to recite his mantra at every opportunity, although the actual effects of the policies that he is carrying out are in direct conflict with it.

How can the Home Secretary keep talking about the development of neighbourhood policing when, in Essex, for example, he is taking away the figurehead and symbol of law and order in Essex which, personified in one man, gives credibility and authority to everything that the Essex police do—the chief constable of Essex? If the Home Secretary abolishes the chief constable, to whom will Essex police belong? At the moment they are our police; they belong to the people of Essex. Under the Home Secretary's proposals, they will belong to some vague, remote and anonymous region or sub-region. This is an utterly destructive development, which certainly does not command the support of the people of Essex.

This Bill represents the disease of which the process of amalgamation is but one symptom. It is when the problems get too difficult that they seem to be easier to address by moving the deckchairs around on the Titanic, rather than by dealing with the water coming into the ship's hull. Indeed, under this Government, given the bureaucracy that has been piled on to our public services, there are now so many deckchairs stacked on the Titanic and being moved around that it is a wonder that this great ship ever floated in the first place.

The disease affects not just policing but local government. The hon. Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) said that local authorities had the freedom to spend their money as they saw fit, but let us be realistic. Every local authority in the land is struggling to make ends meet just to satisfy the statutory responsibilities that central Government have given it, yet central Government pile on more and more statutory responsibilities and impose yet more restrictions on local government's freedom to spend their money as they think fit.

The same disease is also affecting the health service. What are the problems in the health service? The Government have decided that they—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. The hon. Gentleman has illustrated his point; perhaps he will now confine his remarks to the Bill before us.

Mr. Jenkin: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker; I am perhaps getting carried away with my theme. But having one, two, five or 13 primary care trusts does not demonstrate the fitness of a Government to tackle the real problems in the health service, and the same point applies to the police service.

What about regional government? My hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) made a very apposite point. It is all very well for the Liberal Democrats to talk about localism and their local credentials, but they support the principle of regional government, or at least they did when—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman to relate his comments to the Bill that we are discussing.

Mr. Jenkin: If I may say so, Madam Deputy Speaker, the police force amalgamations, in which this Bill plays a part, seem to feed directly into the regional agenda, which should have been ditched following rejection of it in the north-east referendum just 18 months ago. This Bill is part of the top-down, Whitehall micro-management disease. I wish that the Government could see that proposals that they believe will improve police forces' local responsiveness will in fact do exactly the opposite.

I have to tell the Minister—and the Home Secretary, who I hope will receive a report of this debate—that discussion is taking place in Essex about whether police force restructuring should take place without a referendum. A number of my parliamentary colleagues are holding such talks with Essex county council, which has the power to call a referendum on the issue. That is the way the discussion is going. With my experience of facilitating the "North-east says No" campaign, I have no doubt that we would win any referendum on the survival of the Essex police by eight or more to one.

The centralising tendencies of Whitehall Governments extend further back than 1997. They reach further back than even the second world war. They reach right back to the first world war and beyond it, to the first social measures that were taken towards the end of the 19th century. However, there must come a point at which centralisation stops. Were there to be a referendum on the future of the Essex police, it would represent the beginning of a great political movement in this country to restore real local autonomy, and devolution of power and authority to the organs of local government—not least to the county of Essex, representing the shire government that even William the Conqueror inherited, from Alfred the Great.

5.46 pm

Mr. Boris Johnson (Henley) (Con): Of course I wish to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) on his sterling defence of the Essex police force. However, I wish to draw attention to an opportunity that the Bill gives us to rectify a matter of serious and widespread public concern, which has already been addressed by the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone) and my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert). That matter is the extradition arrangements that we have with the United States, and what we may expect from America and what they may demand from us.

I do not wish to indulge in an anti-American polemic, but I wish to suggest a speedy way in which the problem could be rectified in a way that would reassure the Americans that those suspected of serious criminal offences will be speedily yielded up to them—in a way that they would expect from their most important international friend and ally—while at the same time protecting the rights of UK nationals. I am grateful to right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House who have signed my early-day motion on the subject.

I hope that the Government will agree that the neatest solution would be to insert a line into the Bill—along with the many other amendments to the Extradition Act 2003—to incorporate article 7 of the European convention on extradition, so that any country may refuse extradition if the offence may be deemed to have been committed in whole or in part on its territory. I shall explain why I believe that change to be essential.

There are currently several cases before the courts that arise directly from the Extradition Act 2003. I know of one of those cases particularly, because it affects one of my constituents, who is one of three bankers who are being electromagnetically sucked—hoovered, even—across the Atlantic without any duty on the Americans to produce any prima facie evidence.

[Mr. Boris Johnson]

I have no direct evidence of whether the Americans are right or wrong to say that my constituent has committed the offences, but everybody—including the American authorities—agrees on one point. Insofar as there were any offences, in this case and all other analogous cases, they were committed by UK nationals, in this country and against UK interests. If there was a crime, it was a British crime. We may ask, therefore, why we are exporting our nationals to the US so willingly, when the natural forum for trial is obviously this country and when it is inconceivable that we would willingly export our nationals to any other part 2 country—any other country in category 2.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman of the rules of sub judice relating to individual cases currently before the courts. Reference to sub judice in the legislation is acceptable, but detail on individual cases should be avoided.

Mr. Johnson: I am indebted to you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I do not think that anything that I have said, or am likely to say, could in any way prejudice the outcome of any trial, but I am grateful for your reminder.

Why is it inconceivable that any other country could be treated in that way? It is because America, rightly or wrongly, takes a wide view of her jurisdiction and awards herself a great deal of latitude in deciding who to demand and how to treat them when they arrive in America. The Prime Minister himself has said that Guantanamo Bay is an anomaly. There are people on both sides of the House who would use stronger language. It is in that context that people in this country need reassurance about our arrangements. What I am proposing, what I hope my Front-Bench colleagues are about to propose and what my hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) has already suggested would provide that reassurance. We have set out to bring our extradition arrangements with America into alignment with those of every other European country.

The Minister for Policing, Security and Community Safety does not seem to be attending with the interest that one would hope, but it might be of interest to her to know that in virtually every other European country there is no tradition of extraditing nationals. We do it, and the Irish do it, but they have incorporated article 7 of the European convention on extradition into their extradition law in exactly the way that I have suggested so that if one of their nationals has committed a crime in whole or in part in Ireland, there is no question of extradition.

Mr. Francois: I am mindful of the guidance that Madam Deputy Speaker has given the House with regard to sub judice and I shall attempt to abide by it. Does my hon. Friend agree with me that when that powerful treaty was put through the House, we accepted it on the basis that it was necessary to fight the war against terror, on which we have stood shoulder to shoulder with our American counterparts? However, practical experience has shown that the US Administration have begun to use the treaty for other measures. For instance, the Internal Revenue Service has attempted to use the arrangement in order to extradite people to the US to face charges relating to white-collar crime. Does my hon. Friend accept that while the protection of revenue is important, such extraditions are against the spirit of the agreement and there should at least be equivalence on both sides, rather than allowing this anomaly to continue?

Mr. Johnson: My hon. Friend is exactly on the point. It would not only be reassuring to people in this country if we were to restore that symmetry, it would also be reassuring to the Americans because they do not want to keep hearing anti-American claptrap. It would take away a stick that anti-Americans—perhaps there are some on the Labour Benches—might use to beat them.

There is a second and related problem that greatly inflames the whole question. We are obliged by the terms of the Extradition Act 2003 to send our nationals to America without prima facie evidence, yet America is under no corresponding duty to send people we want from America without prima facie evidence being supplied by us. I will not breach your guidelines on sub judice, Madam Deputy Speaker, but let us suppose that a group of New York bankers was accused of having used an e-mail account in the UK to defraud a New York bank. It is highly unlikely that the authorities in this country would seek their extradition to Britain, but even if they did so, the American authorities would insist that the UK showed due cause. However, we place no such parallel and symmetrical obligation on them. That is a grotesque imbalance.

Why does that grotesque imbalance exist? The Prime Minister said in Prime Minister's questions on Wednesday that it is because the American Congress has not ratified the 2003 treaty. That is not, strictly speaking, true. It is right to say that Congress does not want to ratify the 2003 treaty because many Congressmen want to keep the ability to retain in America people whom they fear would not get a fair trial overseas and they want to keep a political bar to extradition. That is why we have not succeeded in extraditing a single IRA suspect from America to this country in 30 years. However, even if Congress were to ratify this treaty, it is a dismal fact that—I am sorry if I am speaking loudly, but I thought that the Minister was not listening and I am delighted to see that she is; I thank her for paying attention because what I am saying is very important—there would be no symmetry because we have to show due cause and they do not. Therefore, I think the whole treaty should be renegotiated. It is a mistake, it was done in great haste and it should be renegotiated.

In the interim, I have a proposal that I hope the Minister can accept. We could clear up the anomaly, rectify the injustice and remove the asymmetry if we inserted a single line into the Bill to say that in designating a part 2 territory the Home Secretary should do nothing inconsistent with the terms of an extant treaty. That would be a neat and useful method because the Americans have not ratified the 2003 treaty, therefore the 1972 arrangements are still in effect and they provide an element of reciprocity in our arrangements. Under the 1972 treaty, both sides have to show prima facie evidence. Therefore, if we inserted such a line into the Bill the asymmetry would be removed, America and the UK would be on the same footing and we would be obliged to show in court why we wanted so-and-so to be extradited to face trial in our territory, and they would have to show why America was the place to have the trial and not the UK. In the interim, it would also supply the Americans with a powerful incentive to get on with ratifying the 2003 treaty.

I know that a great many people in the House share my concerns. I hope that the Minister—unlike the Home Secretary, who has been really rather rude in his treatment of this matter—will accept that there is merit and justice in this case and that a great many people on both sides of the House care about it very deeply. It would mean that a good deal of public disquiet about our extradition arrangements would be alleviated and that we in this country would no longer give the impression of being obedient little lapdogs. It would mean the removal of a weapon from the arsenal of anti-American prejudice and we in the House would be fulfilling our most vital function, which is to protect the rights of our citizens, UK nationals, in the way that every other country in Europe protects the rights of its nationals.

Mr. Jenkin: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I understand that some hon. Members might have to suck or chew something unobtrusively if they have a sore throat, but I find it somewhat paradoxical in a debate about the respect agenda that a Government Member should be very visibly chewing gum. Is it in order for an hon. Member—I shall not embarrass him by naming him—to chew gum obtrusively in the Chamber?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think that that is a point of order for the Chair. I hope that all hon. Members will be polite in their behaviour when present in the Chamber.

Stephen Pound (Ealing, North) (Lab): Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Are you aware that some hon. Members may be suffering

"the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune"

in that they are trying to give up smoking tobacco and may be masticating medicinally on occasion and should therefore possibly be forgiven?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman. That thought crossed my mind, but I thought that it was better not say it in case that was not so. I hope that the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) is satisfied with that explanation.

6.1 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Bexleyheath and Crayford) (Con): Let us get back to the Bill.

I should like to make a brief contribution, and I am pleased to be able to participate in what has been a very important debate today. Of course, the Bill's aims of building safer, stronger communities and instilling a culture of respect are highly commendable and would be welcomed by all hon. Members. Whether legislation can ever achieve such aims remains an open question.

I commend the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Arundel and South Downs (Nick Herbert), who gave a powerful presentation of the case against some aspects of the Bill and highlighted some of our concerns. We all agree that the Bill has some good points, but Conservative Members have great concern about the centralising influences that the Government seem to show in all their measures, and the Bill is no exception.

Yes, real issues to do with antisocial behaviour and police restructuring have come across in the debate today, but some of us are rather concerned that the Home Secretary did not answer the point that was made in interventions on him that the real reason for the Bill is perhaps police authority restructuring. That is behind the Bill, which is being wrapped up under the guise of an antisocial behaviour measure, when something a little more sinister is, in fact, behind it. Phrases such as "technical", "bureaucratic" and "too much central control" seem to be the hallmarks of large parts of the Bill.

In my constituency, however, the most important issues are those associated with the antisocial behaviour that our constituents face every day of their lives, and I want to centre my limited contribution in today's debate on those issues. In particular, police community support officers have been mentioned in general, but I want to highlight how important they have been in improving community safety in my constituency.

I was one of the sceptics when the proposal for CSOs first came into being. I was sceptical because I wondered how they could do the job and what contribution they could make to improve antisocial behaviour and reduce criminal activity in our borough. I was sceptical, too, about their training and about their role—their powers and their responsibilities—but I welcome what CSOs have achieved so far and what will happen under the Bill to standardise their powers and responsibilities. I still have some doubts about their training and wonder whether it could be better and more extensive, but I am sure that that will be debated at length in Committee.

It is true to say that when we go around any Conservative Member's constituency we see that the police are very much respected and their work is much appreciated. However, the tide of antisocial behaviour, vandalism and graffiti that has occurred during the past decade is still growing worse and worse—in fact, it has become an epidemic in some areas—and residents, shopkeepers, business people and visitors are all appalled by the situation in which we find ourselves in a society where people do not have a great deal of respect for one another. Of course, that is the reason why we are debating the Bill.

I met some of the residents of the Hurst Place estate in the northern part of my constituency. They came to see me because they felt that the vandalism, graffiti and bad behaviour of the youths in our society was out of control. That is the key issue that most people find: they are worried about where things are going and how they will end up. Anything that can be done to improve those aspects of antisocial behaviour will be welcomed. Part 3 is welcome, because local authorities will have a new role with oversight committees to scrutinise crime and disorder reduction partnerships, which is very positive.

As always, the worry with this Government is the vagueness of the call for community action. They use wonderful phrases in their approach, but what does it actually mean in reality? Of course, the Government say that they will allow communities to request action on the community safety issues that they consider the police or other organisations and crime reduction partners have failed to address adequately, but I am not sure what that means in reality. What does it mean for the people who are already suffering? In Committee, we look forward to taxing out more from the Government.

Stephen Pound: Taxing?

Mr. Evennett: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is not happy with the word "taxing", but we do not get any meat from the Government; we get a bit of waffle in many ways.

The third issue is the extension of the range of agencies that can enter into parenting contracts and apply for parenting orders. I intervened on the hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Lynne Featherstone) when she was being very negative about that proposal. She was concerned about training and the organisations that might be included, but I welcome that measure. If we really want to get to grips with the problems, we must be positive. The Liberal Democrats were not positive, but I welcome what the Government are endeavouring to do in that respect. However, the restructuring of other organisations is very technical, and many hon. Members are not happy with those parts of the Bill. We should concentrate on the real issues that affect individuals.

I was interested to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson), who made a very powerful contribution and highlighted the other issue that I was going to raise in my contribution, but as he said it in such a powerful and interesting way, I will not continue with it, other than to say that he makes a valid point about which Conservative Members are very concerned. I know that the Minister has been listening avidly not only to what I have said, but what he said on the matter, and I am sure that she will take on board the issue, so that we can have some action on it.

There is much to welcome in the Bill, but there are other areas where we feel that there is another agenda, which is to do with police restructuring and taking the decisions higher up and away from the local community. Conservative Members believe that localism is important and that people should feel an affinity with their local police force and with the people who enforce the law in their localities. In many ways, aspects of the Bill give more and more power to the Home Secretary and assign things to larger organisations. That will not deal with the problems or allow organisations to feel ownership of the solution for dealing with antisocial behaviour in their localities.

There is much that is good in the Bill, but we are concerned about aspects that take things in the opposite direction to the way in which we believe that they should be going, which is to make sure that local communities have ownership of local problems and the solutions, too. As the Bill proceeds, we will push hard on the two or three points that I have highlighted.

6.10 pm

Mrs. Sharon Hodgson (Gateshead, East and Washington, West) (Lab): I welcome the Bill wholeheartedly. It contains numerous measures across a wide range of areas that will improve our police forces and the quality of life in all our constituencies in many ways. I am pleased that that is recognised on both sides of the House and that the Opposition have said that they will not divide the House on Second Reading.

I welcome the strengthening of the powers and role of community support officers in part 1. The Bill standardises CSO powers so that CSOs can contribute fully to neighbourhood policing and deal with more issues on the spot. I also welcome giving police CSOs the power to deal with truants. They are well placed to deal with them because they are on duty in the community and can obviously spot truants, especially the regular ones. That starts to give one the image of a Britain of yesteryear, when the local bobby would be on the beat and spot little Johnny or Betty and know them by name and where they live, and would then escort them home to surprised and often cross parents. That was a time when communities worked together for all their inhabitants and when the police and all other public servants were accorded much respect—I am sure that the House would agree that they deserved it, as they do today.

I also welcome the strengthening of powers to tackle crime and antisocial behaviour and especially the extension of the number of agencies that can enter into parenting contracts and apply for parenting orders. That brings me on to part 2, "Powers of police". With regard to the new extension of powers for the police to stop and search people at airports, I want to draw the House's attention to the practical difficulties of enforcing football banning orders. The other point that I want to raise relates more specifically to persons entering or leaving the country, who are under no obligation to account for their identity to the police if requested to do so. I am keen to move quickly on the issue because of the 2006 World cup, which is being hosted by Germany, and the likelihood of officers being required to perform port operations to screen football fans without the legislative backing to do so.

While researching the matter, I have spoken to numerous representatives from the police, including Michael Downes, who is a national representative on the Police Federation. He has conducted numerous pieces of research and has spoken to experts in policing football disorder and members of the police who conduct port operations during international fixtures.

I will give the House some background to the operation of football banning orders. Letters are sent to persons subject to the orders prior to or at the commencement of the control period, which is usually five days before the event or fixture. The letters direct those persons to comply with the order, which could involve surrendering a passport or signing in at a police station. There is no national policy or approach to ensure that the orders are complied with. Research suggests that it is unlikely that they are, or that breaches are detected. That is often because the matter is simply not a priority in all forces and little or no training is given to front-counter staff in this area of legislation.

In addition, there is no requirement to inform the authorities of a change of residence, and although the Violent Crime Reduction Bill tries to deal with that, it does not appear to cater for persons working away from home. That is a major problem for police officers, who are often not told that X or Y is working away for a week or so, thus making it impossible to police the order.

Persons are also entitled to apply for duplicate passports if they claim that the original has been lost or stolen. They can also be issued with a duplicate passport if they claim that they are waiting for a visa application to be processed. In addition, if travelling in the EU, there is no requirement to possess a passport. A driving licence can be accepted as sufficient identification to travel. That is not a major problem at present because most airline operators have a company policy that requires a passport to be produced on departure. It should be noted, however, that car ferry companies often record only the lead name plus the number of passengers. It is likely that a large number of the fans who attend the 2006 World cup in Germany will travel by car and ferry. Approximately 48 ferries leave Dover a day, each with a capacity of 2,000 passengers. Dover is, of course, only one major shipping port. Others such as Hull will also play a major role during the event.

Entries are made on the police national computer showing details of football banning orders. However, because of technical difficulties, people are shown as "wanted/missing". That is also the case for sex offenders and persons subject to antisocial behaviour orders. That causes two major problems. First, people are being detained unlawfully because they are shown as "wanted", and, secondly, port operations are not as efficient or effective as they could be.

Police officers have no power to request the production of any form of identification from persons entering or leaving the UK. If a police officer saw a person leaving the country and wanted to establish their identity—for example, to find out whether they were wanted on a warrant or for an arrestable offence, subject to a football banning order, or recorded on the sex offenders register—they could not do so. In addition, at the moment—this matter is included in the Bill—police officers have no authority to examine rail, shipping or flight manifests. That is why I welcome the extension of powers in the Bill.

British Transport police play a key role in port operations as a result of Eurotunnel and subsequent rail links into France and onwards. Legislators often use words such as "port" or "police officer", but they cause British Transport police officers some difficulty. All Eurotunnel journeys commence at railway stations, not ports, which is where the difficulty arises. It would also be more useful if the term "constable" was used as an alternative to "police officer", as I note that it is in the Bill.

The points that I have mentioned cause police officers considerable difficulties in performing their duties efficiently and effectively. I hope that the majority of the issues will be addressed in Committee.

I welcome many other aspects of the Bill. I not only welcome the powers on stop and search, but ask for them to go further. Part 3, which I will not speak about in detail, covers the measures in our respect agenda to deal with antisocial behaviour and improve the parenting of young people. Those measures should be welcomed by the whole House, as they are. I look forward to following the Bill's progress in Committee.

6.18 pm

Mark Pritchard (The Wrekin) (Con): The Bill is revealing in what it does not include, rather than in what it does. It does not provide an opportunity for hon. Members to debate the most important change to policing in this country for more than 70 years: the amalgamation of police forces. There is great concern in my constituency that West Mercia police, despite being one of the best-performing forces in the country, will be banished to a super-force that will include Birmingham, which bears no relation to the rural policing needs of Shropshire.

I accept that the West Mercia force is not perfect. Constituents write to me and telephone me to say that they would like police officers to respond more quickly, and rightly so. There are issues arising from neighbourhood policing. There is a wish to see more police officers on the beat. These shortcomings are predominantly the fault of the Government, who have created more paperwork for police officers and have caused officers to spend more time in police stations rather than on patrol, where people like to see them.

In market towns such as Shifnal, Albrighton, Wellington and Newport in my constituency, constituents want to see police officers on the beat. The Government's amalgamation plans will mean that there will be fewer police officers on the streets of rural Shropshire, and more police from Shropshire on the urban streets of places such as Birmingham and Stoke-on-Trent. Once again, the relevant legislation will be passed under secondary legislation—by order of the Secretary of State rather than by the will of the House, which is the will of the people.

Is it not perverse that today we can discuss extending the powers of community support officers to pick up truants—we support such measures—yet cannot discuss, as representatives of the people who put us here, the issues that concern us most? Such issues include the amalgamation of well-performing police forces such as West Mercia. It is a perverse use of parliamentary time. It is another affront to the House, showing that the Government care more about issuing press releases than about bringing matters before the House for proper and full debate that is both transparent and accountable to the people.

The Bill sets out the importance of community and neighbourhood policing—an issue on which the Minister should respond. We are concerned that police authorities will be less accountable, especially if we have strategic police authorities. I am aware that there will be a transitional period of two years, after which the Government might consider policing panels. Where are policing panels in the Bill? They are not mentioned. We are supposed to take it on trust that the Secretary of State will introduce policing panels in future. I will be grateful for the Minister's comments on that.

Part of the rationale of strategic police forces is to deal with the gap in so-called level 2 policing. Can we not deal with that through the already established taskforce? Could we not consider appointing more senior police officers within existing police forces who have experience of anti-terrorism operations?

I am aware that the West Mercia police force is recruiting a senior officer, and I hope that the Government will not intervene. The recruitment will allow the police authority to appoint an officer with, I hope, anti-terrorism experience, to fulfil some of the objectives that the Government have set in their plans.

I would be quite relaxed about the regionalisation of special branch. There is certainly an argument for better co-ordination of special branch officers in the region. However, we do not have to regionalise the whole of west midlands policing to deliver that end. The Serious Organised Crime Agency will fulfil many of the objectives that the Government have said they are trying to achieve through the regionalisation of police forces. It seems that the Government are fulfilling a regional agenda at any attempt while ignoring the will of the people. I call on the Minister to give an undertaking that if the people of West Mercia, through their local authorities, should ask the Government for a referendum, they will be allowed to decide whether they wish to retain the existing West Mercia force.

Are the Government not aware of the importance of morale? There are hard-working police officers and community support officers who do not want to be part of a regional super-force. Morale at present is very low as a result of the Government's proposals. It was Sir Ian Blair who asked—I do not often quote the Metropolitan Police Commissioner—during the Dimbleby lecture what was the purpose of the police. The Secretary of State has tried to answer that question today, perhaps for the first time after many months of lobbying. We need to ask also what local people believe that the police are for. What do they want the police to do? The overriding answer that I hear is that they want more local policing on the streets. They want more community policing. The measures set out in the Bill will not deliver that. On the face of it, there is much talk about it, but I doubt whether it will deliver it. That is why people are concerned.

Mr. Francois: I am enjoying my hon. Friend's speech. If I may say so, he is making a powerful case. As for the level 2 tasks, I understand that the Government have rejected the so-called federation approach of getting a number of different constabularies in a region to work together to combat terrorism. I thought that that had some merit. Is there not the alternative of their working with elements of the Serious Organised Crime Agency to provide a link between constabularies and thereby fight terrorism in the regions? That might be a good way to address the problem, and a number of chief constables, including my own, have said that they think that that is quite a good idea.

Mark Pritchard: My hon. Friend makes two excellent points—namely, the issues of SOCA and federation. As I mentioned last week in the House, the Government are always lecturing Opposition Members to listen to professionals. Why do not the Government listen to professionals? Why not listen to the West Mercia chief constable, Paul West? Why not listen to the police authority? It wants the Government to leave it alone and allow it to get on with its job. The point about regional co-operation without having to go into all of the major changes that the Government are proposing is one that has been made well. I hope that the Minister will respond to that.

It was Sir Ian Blair who said that national security depends on neighbourhood security. We so often hear about the lack of human intelligence. Often, low-level crime leads the police to an awareness of higher-level crime. If we see a reduction of police contact on the street with local people, I think that the Government's aims of defeating terrorism and serious crime will be undermined through lack of human intelligence and a lack of communication with local police constables.

There are numerous cases throughout the land where the local bobby on the beat has uncovered a major crime, including an attempt at a major terrorist incident. It is not always the regional taskforce or the intelligence agencies that do that. Often successes are due to the hard work, diligence and care of local constables on the beat. They cannot be looking for serious crime in Shropshire if they are being asked to attend football events in Birmingham.

I ask the Minister to consider the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Cameron). He set out an alternative approach that is based on the key principles of sharing responsibility and trusting people. He proposes that

> "Central control of the police would be replaced with direct local accountability through elected commissioners or police authorities, rebuilding the link between forces and their communities."

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I need to offer the hon. Gentleman a cautionary word. There are ways in which, by reference to the contents of the Bill, one can refer to the organisation of the police force, but one cannot major on it, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged at the outset of his speech. Therefore, he should not major on it.

Mark Pritchard: I am grateful for your wise counsel, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I was concluding on the first part of my speech, which focuses only on the regionalisation of police forces. I will conclude with three or four more sentences on the point so as not to distract my thoughts. That will mean that I will not need to include in my final remarks the substantive remarks in my introductory comments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is defying my advice very elegantly, but I recommend that he should not do so.

Mark Pritchard: That is a sound recommendation, which I am happy to accept, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

May I turn to clause 15, which deals with the role of local authorities? The Government claim that local authorities will have more responsibility as a result of the extended role of community partnerships, so will the Minister give due consideration, as the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mrs. Moon) suggested, to the role of youth services? If local authorities are asked to do more and if they are to be made more accountable, particularly for crime reduction, I hope that the Home Office will urge the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to provide adequate funding from existing resources for youth services. Time and again, my constituents say that young people are not all involved in antisocial activity—it would clearly be wrong to suggest that they are—but a small minority are often involved in such activity because they are bored. I therefore hope that local authorities will be encouraged to provide more youth services.

The Government have encouraged the setting-up of one-stop shops, enabling young people to attend a youth centre where they can receive drugs counselling and advice on schooling. Those one-stop shops are not always accessible to everyone in a given geographical area. Labour-led Telford and Wrekin borough council has suggested that a super-youth centre should be established in Stafford park, which is miles from many of the young people in my constituency. They cannot reach it on public transport but, even if they wanted to do so, why cannot they have a youth centre within three or four miles of their home, not seven, eight or even 10 miles away? I therefore hope that the key role of youth services in the Bill will be expanded in Committee.

Clause 12 deals with conditional cautions, but I am concerned that it will bypass the courts and allow prosecutors to levy lenient fines and light community sentences. My constituents and, indeed, the constituents of many hon. Members will be alarmed by the detail of the Bill and its implications for individuals who commit serious crimes such as actual bodily harm, affray, criminal damage and the possession of class A drugs such as cocaine and heroin. The Bill provides a soft option for those offenders, with a maximum penalty of £500 or 20 hours of community work. Communities in my constituency are blighted by criminal damage and affray, yet the Government have sent out a signal in the Bill that people are likely to receive only 20 hours of community work or a fine of £500, which may never be paid.

Clause 9 deals with the duty of ship and aircraft owners to provide passenger and crew information. I support the measure, but the Government are in danger of putting resources and energy into gathering data rather than gathering smart data, which is more likely to be of value to our intelligence agencies and police forces. If they genuinely wish to make provision for port security, what are they are doing to monitor and assess threats from cargo ships? Despite all the rhetoric and talk about homeland security they have still not created a post of homeland security Minister. It is time that they made their intentions clear. I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) is not in the Chamber, but I suspect that he would be in the running for such a job. I hope that that does not offend the Minister—I believe that she, too, would be in the running, and I wish her well in that endeavour. It is time that the Government appointed a homeland security Minister and sent out a clear signal to people who would harm this country and undermine our national security that they take terrorism and national security seriously. I pay tribute to the excellent work of my right hon. Friend the Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) who, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Newark (Patrick Mercer), has been tireless in reminding the Government of the issue. I hope that when the Government eventually declare that they have set up a department of homeland security or created a new ministerial post in the Home Office they will give credit where it is due and acknowledge my colleagues' role.

Clauses 33 to 35 deal with cyber crime—a subject that has already been raised today. I refer Members to my interest in the Register of Members' Interests, and I wish to declare that I am parliamentary vice-chairman of the Conservative technology forum. Its annual general meeting is under way as I speak, so I shall be late.

Stephen Pound: We need not detain the hon. Gentleman.

Mark Pritchard: I am grateful to hon. Gentleman, whose interventions are timely but not always relevant.

I welcome the proposals to increase the penalties for cyber crime, but I am concerned that in the very week in which we are discussing the Bill the Government are considering sharing intelligence data with other so-called competent law enforcement agencies in Europe. Under questioning, al-Qaeda suspects have admitted that cyber crime and cyber terrorism were one of their key objectives. They have admitted trying to infiltrate critical British infrastructures for the intelligence agencies and, allegedly, our nuclear and energy infrastructures. I am concerned that the Government have allowed a great deal of information to be shared with third parties that may not have the same security that we have in the United Kingdom. I do not believe that UK security is sufficient, and I hope that the Government will do all that they can to support the excellent work of experts on cyber crime and terrorism in the Cabinet Office.

In conclusion, I wish to put on record my thanks for the hard work and dedication of police officers and community support officers throughout the West Mercia police force, particularly the officers who serve the Wrekin parliamentary constituency. For many years, I have supported the work of the police. I am a late convert, I admit, to the role of CSOs, but I am concerned that the extension of their powers will lead to their being less visible if they spend more time in police stations doing paperwork. I am concerned, too, that CSOs will receive the same level of training, but will be asked to do more. We need to ensure that they receive increased training. I share the concerns of some of my constituents that CSOs do not have the power of arrest and do not carry a police warrant card. I am extremely worried that the extension of powers will leave them in a position where they have not received the relevant training, they do not carry a warrant card and they do not have respect. As a result, they may well come into harm's way. Is it not the case that police officers, along with many Conservative Members, support CSOs when they are working in co-operation and collaboration with police officers on the beat? That is where they are most effective. Those, in paraphrase, are the words of the Police Federation.

The Bill is another example of the Government talking localism while centralising more powers. Allowing policing in Shropshire to be run by the Home Secretary from his desk in Whitehall will not work and is a recipe for disaster. It is a travesty to allow Parliament to debate extending CSO powers with respect to truants, but not to allow us a comprehensive debate and a Division on the amalgamation of excellent police forces such as West Mercia.

James Brokenshire (Hornchurch) (Con): The Bill offers the House the opportunity of a wide-ranging debate on policing. I noted that the Home Secretary emphasised that in his initial comments, when he said that the Bill would have an impact at every level of policing. I share his aspiration of creating safer communities, although I may approach the topic from a different perspective.

It has been interesting to hear Members' comments during the debate. There is clearly a strong feeling that the intent behind certain aspects of the Bill is to implement the regionalisation agenda. My hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) spoke about his support of his local police force. My hon. Friend the Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) dealt with the situation in Essex and whether that county will push for a referendum on the implementation of any changes to the Essex police force. As a Member whose constituency borders Essex—many of my constituents would probably like to be in Essex—I find that an interesting proposal. I and other hon. Members will follow developments in Essex with great interest.

I shall focus my remarks on three issues arising from the Bill. First, there is the direction of travel and the prospect of centralisation. Although local control may be emphasised, it will not necessarily be implemented through the provisions. Secondly, there is the impact of the creation of the new chief inspector for justice, community safety and custody. Thirdly, there are the missed opportunities in relation to extradition.

The Bill allows us to debate the role and function of the police. I begin with some comments from Sir Ian Blair, the Metropolitan Police Commissioner, in his recent Dimbleby lecture, when he said:

"We don't want one kind of police force being nice to people and another one arriving in darkened vans wearing the balaclavas. Whoever is responsible for the one has to be responsible for the other."

That provokes an interesting theoretical debate about the control of the police and where that direction comes from. Some of the emphasis in the Bill seems to take a dual approach, rather than the single approach for which the Metropolitan Police Commissioner called. Centralised control takes the form of the right of intervention by the Home Secretary in the operation of the police, whereas local control is much less defined or thought out and lacks teeth.

On the powers of intervention, the explanatory notes to the Bill contain the soothing comment that those would be used only as "a last resort". I am not wholly convinced by those words. The approach outlined in the Bill will strengthen the internal culture of direction from the centre, with more limited input and direction from the local bodies intended to reflect the differing needs and aspirations of communities. The Home Secretary was tut-tutting from the Front Bench and the Minister is shaking her head, but when we analyse the Bill in Committee, we will see what the direction of travel is and what protection is afforded to local communities. The Bill appears to give the Home Secretary greater control and greater power.

Sir Chris Fox, the president of the Association of Chief Police Officers, said:

"These measures may lead to more centralised direction at a time when forces are trying to give a local response to local problems."

The Bill could have strengthened local police authorities by giving them, rather than the Home Secretary, the power to set strategic objectives and to be more relevant to the public by greater accountability, perhaps through election. What we have is very different. Schedule 2 reserves specific powers to the Secretary of State to play a greater role in the composition of individual police authorities and to determine strategic priorities for police in police authority areas. From my reading of the schedule, there is nothing to suggest that different priorities can be set for different police authorities, rather than a straightforward structural approach setting out parameters for all police authorities. The Minister may be able to offer some clarification in her winding-up speech.

There are significant powers to give directions to chief police officers and to police authorities in much wider circumstances than previously. Although there is a requirement for the Home Secretary to allow an opportunity for police officers and police authorities to make alternative proposals, it seems to be entirely at the discretion of the Home Secretary to ignore those, without even offering the chance for such measures to be implemented to see how they work out.

I appreciate that the Home Secretary may wish to intervene rapidly in a failing authority, but that circumstance would have been apparent for some time. The swingeing powers that the Home Secretary has reserved to himself to intervene, without the police authority or the chief police officer having an opportunity to offer an alternative proposal, seem to be extremely strong. No doubt we will hear more soothing words this evening about the implementation of that power and how it would be used, but it does not give much protection and allows the Home Office to intervene more readily than in the past. The comments of the right hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) are germane. If that approach were taken, it would make the Home Secretary responsible for policing throughout the country. Perhaps that is what he wants. We will find out as the Bill proceeds.

It is interesting to contrast those powers with the backstop, as the Home Secretary called it, or what I might describe as window dressing—the community call for action, which would impose duties on local ward councillors to sort out crime and disorder in the areas that they represent, backed up by a council overview and scrutiny committee that can issue reports to relevant authorities, but without any teeth to ensure that any of the recommendations in its reports is followed up. The process seems highly bureaucratic and less effective than existing arrangements.

Safer neighbourhood teams are already holding public meetings and fostering a direct relationship with their communities. A direct relationship with a safer neighbourhood team may be more effective than the bureaucratic approach of referring an issue to a ward councillor, and I am looking forward to the regulations specifying how quickly the ward councillor must respond. What additional resources will be made available to ward councillors to process requests? The scrutiny committees will review such matters and make recommendations, which is not the most effective way to ensure that action is taken on the ground quickly, efficiently and effectively to deal with antisocial behaviour in local communities.

Mark Pritchard: Does my hon. Friend agree that localism would be enhanced by directly elected police commissioners setting local priorities, rather than by local priorities being set in Whitehall by the Home Secretary?

James Brokenshire: I agree that the local community should have a greater sense of control. The regionalisation debate is framed by the fact that local people feel powerless when it comes to influencing the direction and emphasis of local policing. My hon. Friend has made a powerful point, and I look forward to developing that thought process on ensuring that local communities have a greater say and a greater involvement in how local policing is undertaken in their areas. The Bill is a missed opportunity to promote, debate, discuss and emphasise such approaches.

My second point concerns the creation of the new chief inspector for justice, community safety and custody. I know that that process has been driven to some extent by the Gershon savings that the Chancellor has sought to impose to make the inspectorates more efficient, but my concern is that the inspectorates should not become less effective. I know that the loss of the chief inspector of prisons has rung alarm bells at a time when standards in prisons and, in particular, standards in young people's secure accommodation are at the forefront, given the Carlile inquiry on children in secure accommodation.

I note that the Bill contains specific provisions on how the inspection of prisons is undertaken, but the chief inspector of prisons, Anne Owers,

"remains concerned that, over time and in practice, the sharp focus and robustly independent voice of the Prisons Inspectorate may be lost or muffled within a larger whole."

Juliet Lyon of the Prison Reform Trust has also emphasised that view:

"The sharp focus on the treatment of prisoners and prison conditions, and the immense authority carried by a succession of post holders and admired across the world cannot but be diluted by these new suggested arrangements."

That concern is clearly significant, and I note that the Home Secretary referred to it in his initial comments. When a combination of all the inspectorates is brought to bear, it is important that the standards, knowledge and ability that allow proper inspections to take place are maintained.

My final point builds on the strong comments by my hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Johnson) on the opportunity to review the Extradition Act 2003. Although the Bill includes some amendments to the 2003 Act, I am disappointed that the opportunity has not been taken to address the manifestly unjust and unfair arrangements that have sprung up as a result of the 2003 Act, which are shown most acutely in the current relationship between the United States and this country.

The Prime Minister has said that the Bill is intended to address issues of terrorism, and there is a broad consensus on the need to be able to deal with those suspected of terrorism efficiently and effectively, but the operation of the 2003 Act has not been limited to such cases. I do not intend to stray into commenting on individual cases, but it seems strange that there appears to be no direct reciprocity between the US and the UK. The situation is imbalanced, because the UK must make out some form of prima facie case in seeking to extradite people from the United States to this country, yet that does not happen in reverse. The fact that we must make a basic case, whereas the US does not, strikes me as iniquitous and grossly unfair.

Whatever the rights or wrongs of any specific case, it is clear that the current arrangements with the US could lead to significant miscarriages of justice and that the Government have failed to stand up for the interests of the citizens of this country. The Home Office has the opportunity to do something about that in this Bill, and for the sake of justice I urge it to seize the opportunity to address the serious imbalance in the extradition arrangements between the US and the UK.

Annette Brooke (Mid-Dorset and North Poole) (LD): I apologise for not being present at the beginning of this important debate, although I have contacted the Speaker's office to explain why.

I share the concerns expressed by hon. Members while I have been in the Chamber about the proposed amalgamation of police forces. I am particularly sad that the federation model has been rejected for Dorset, because it is what people really want.

I shall comment on the Bill in relation to children and young people, who are often blamed for crime and, in particular, antisocial behaviour. Although young people may be involved in many instances of antisocial behaviour, it is untrue to say that they are always responsible, and I share the concerns expressed by many organisations that we must not demonise young people. Even if we accept that some children and young people cause antisocial behaviour, we must remember that a large number of young people are the victims of antisocial behaviour.

When we consider the children and young people who may cause antisocial behaviour or crime, we must examine the reasons for their behaviour. I welcome the recognition by the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mark Pritchard) of the importance of youth services. I have said many times that we started with enforcement and punishment, but that we should have paid much more attention to understanding underlying causes and implementing preventive measures at an earlier stage. I welcome the statement within the respect action plan that we must tackle root causes with the same vigour and determination with which we have taken on antisocial behaviour. It is important to get the right balance between enforcement on antisocial behaviour and tackling the causes of antisocial behaviour.

Clause 4 includes new proposals on community support officers, and I welcome the increase in the number of CSOs. I have been impressed by the contribution made by the few CSOs whom I have met in my constituency, where we would like our fair share of the proposed sixfold increase. CSOs have walked around and engaged with young people, and their job involves balancing enforcement with part of the role of a youth support worker. It is important that the standard set of powers that they will have should be accompanied by statutory requirements for training. A recent Home Office evaluation of the role of CSOs found that many of them expressed concern about that. If there is to be more training, resources will need to be made available to ensure that CSOs receive adequate and appropriate training on how to work effectively, safely and appropriately with children and young people.

The Children's Society, on behalf of the Standing Committee for Youth Justice, calls for the proposed training to include an understanding of child protection and the procedures and services that will enable CSOs to act in the best interests of children, instead of taking a straightforward enforcement approach to their situation and behaviour. At a local level, it argues that such training should be consistent with the local safeguarding children's board arrangements and responsibilities for training. Will the Minister therefore ensure that there is full co-operation with her colleague the Minister for Children and Families?

Clause 5 contains a proposal to introduce a new function for CSOs to allow them to remove young people of school age whom they believe to be absent from school without lawful authority—in other words, an extension of sweeping. I have a few concerns about that. The National Foundation for Educational Research concluded that although truancy sweeps had been successful, in terms of the numbers of young people picked up, and had raised awareness of the issue, it was "less certain of the long-term impact on individual pupil attendance."
